LEEDS FESTIVAL NOVELTIES.

DVORÁK's new Oratorio, "Saint Ludmila," is founded upon incidents in the history of a Bohemian lady. Like Liszt's "St. Elizabeth," Ouseley's "St. Polycarp," and other works connected with hagiology, it has no reference to scriptural story, nor, though the motive is undoubtedly religious, is its course wholly confined to sacred things. It is probable that oratorio will largely take this turn in the future, especially should the present demand for dramatic form continue. Biblical subjects are fast being used up, but in the lives of the Saints abundant material may be found, and there is no special reason why points where the spiritual side touches the mundane and the secular should be overlooked by the librettist.

The story of "Saint Ludmila" is briefly this:

The dawn of a day in spring has arrived, and people of all classes have gathered at the Castle of Melnik to assist at the dedication of a statue of the goddess Bába—a ceremony in which the Princess Ludmila is to take chief part. Rejoicing and prayers incident to such a proceeding are going on, when a strange and formidable person appears upon the scene armed with an axe. His appearance and bearing over-awe the crowd. This is the Christian hermit, Ivan, who has come, fired with indignation, to demolish the idol, and preach the true faith. The first part of his task he accomplishes, despite the outcries of the people, and discharges the second to such purpose that, led by Ludmila, the whole assembly accept the teaching of the bold intruder. With this satisfactory result the first part ends.

The second part begins as Ludmila, with her attendant, Svatava, journeys into the wilderness, seeking Ivan, to be further taught of him. Svatava objects strongly to the pilgrimage, but her mistress presses ever onward, and finally discovers the object of her search. Ludmila is well received by the hermit, who imparts to her ghostly counsel, upon which serious exercise presently breaks in the noise of a hunting party. The sportsmen are Prince Borivoj and his followers—a wild and reckless band of whom Ivan and his guests stand in fear. But the hermit protects himself and them by a miracle. A hind, wounded by an arrow, drops dead at the feet of the holy man, who, with the sign of the cross, restores her to life. Borivoj looks on with wonder, and is soon altogether subdued by the beauty of Ludmila. He enquires of the hermit who she is, and offers himself as a disciple of Ludmila's faith. Ivan confides to the Princess the teaching of his new convert—an arrangement so favouring rapid progress in one direction that the pair are promptly betrothed. A chorus of rejoicing, in which angels join, brings the scene to an end.

The third part is laid in the Cathedral of Velehrad, where have gathered many people to witness the baptism of Ludmila and Borivoj. Of incident here there is scarcely any. We are supposed to witness the holy rite, which is attended by ample expressions of religious feeling, both on the part of the principal personages and the crowd. These give the composer a fine opportunity, and enable him to end the work in triumph. Dramatically, the third part is an anticlimax, but in a musical sense nothing could be better, and this may be accepted as atonement.

The composer has treated his subject at very considerable length. His work contains forty-five numbers, and occupies 262 pages octavo. From this it may be assumed that the various situations and sentiments have ample measure dealt out to them, which indeed is the case. But those who know Dvorák's genius and method will not conclude that the length is tedious. There is an abundance of choral writing in the work. The composer appears to have formed a most favourable estimate of our choirs, and has certainly entrusted to them no small responsibility for the success of "Ludmila." He would seem, also, to have noted the particular forms of choral music most in harmony with English tastes. Hence his concerted pieces are more simply constructed and more massive than, probably, would otherwise have been the case. In some numbers he even seems to be emulous of Handel, and goes as straight to the mark, with as much plainness and directness, as ever did the old master. So far, this is a decided change in Dvorák's style, due, no doubt, to his experience of music in England. A glance at the story shows that the choral writing is necessarily of a varied character. There are pastoral numbers; numbers instinct with the wild fervour of heathen worship; others indicative of terror and uncertainty; others full of the wild joy of the chase, and at the end comes a sequence of Christian praise and thanksgiving. How far the composer succeeds in all these is a question to be reserved for the present, but not without reasonable anticipation that his choruses will form by no means the weakest part of the Oratorio. The solo music shares variety of character with that which is concerted. A peasant sings a pretty pastoral ditty. Ludmila, in her heathen state, has a delightfully melodious air, expressive of the religious aspirations that find satisfaction in Christianity, while her subsequent music is marked by intense emotionalism. Less character appears in the solos of Borivoj, but of Ivan the composer has made an imposing musical personage. He is invested with a grandeur and dignity analogous to that which awed the crowd at Melnik Castle. The orchestration is elaborate and highly picturesque throughout, but never assumes undue prominence, nor to favour it are the voices reduced to the secondary rank of mere machines for the utterance of words. They come well to the front everywhere. Only one independent piece for the orchestra enters into the structure of the work. This is a Prelude, tempo di Marcia, to the third part, of which it forms an interesting feature. Elsewhere the function of the band is to accompany, and this it does, as just intimated, with infinite elaboration of detail and charm of colour. The composer uses a few representative themes, doing so, however, with commendable reticence, and in no case allowing them to interfere with formal and independent treatment of the various numbers. We need scarcely add that Dvorák preserves, both in solo and chorus, a definite form. He rhapsodises nowhere, and again he illustrates his tendency to economise subjects by exhausting their possibilities of treatment—a feature so conspicuous in his "Stabat Mater." Here, for the present, we leave "St. Ludmila." Our next observation of it will be made in fuller light.

Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Story of Sayid" is, as concerns its subject, a very old story indeed. Not one land but many have among their folk-lore some version or other of the legend which sets forth how one man offered his life as security for another, under the influence of sublime devotion. It would appear that such a myth exists among the Mahomedans of India, and we find a verse form of it in Mr. Edwin Arnold's "Pearls of the Faith." The author of Mr. Mackenzie's book, Mr. Joseph Bennett, has made this the basis of his work, but found it needful to effect important changes, as will readily be understood when we say that the original contains no female character. The story, as modified, and as it stands in the Cantata, runs thus:

A band of Arabs, led by their chief, Sayid, have invaded and devastated the territory of a Hindoo Prince named Sáwa. In the first scene the people lament the fate of their country, but their sorrow turns to joy when a watchman on the roof of the palace announces the approach of a messenger, who has to tell that the Arabs have been defeated, and their leader taken captive. Presently the victorious force returns to the city, and Sayid is led forth to die. As he prepares to meet his fate, Sáwa, looking closely at him, recognises a man who, in more peaceful days, gave him water as he was perishing with thirst when hunting in the hills. At once the Prince bids his prisoner ask any boon in return, short of life. Sayid answers that he would see his aged father once more before he dies, promising then to come back and suffer. Sáwa sarcastically demands a hostage; and offers to comply if one be found. Then, to the astonishment of all, his daughter, the Princess Ilmas, steps forward and presents herself as bondwoman. Pity for the gallant Arab, and admiration for his filial devotion, have inspired this sacrifice, in which she persists, though her father protests and the people clamour for the blood of their foe. Sáwa cannot withdraw his promise; the Arab chief is released and rides away, with words of gratitude and assurance upon his lips. The second scene opens in Sáwa's palace, as a storm of thunder is dying in the distance. Ilmas's maidens sing to her that love is sweet, but the Princess dwells upon its strength. Her heart is now given to the Arab chief—pity has turned to love—and in a burst of emotion she invokes the passion to support her “should aught have chanced, and Sayid cannot come.” Hereupon Sáwa and his counsellors enter. Lightnings have flashed from the shrine of Siva; the gods are angry at the delay of justice, and, in the absence of Sayid, his hostage must forthwith suffer. The Princess calmly bids her attendants array her as a bride, “For, if my lord be dead, I go to him, And, if he be alive, he comes to me.” The third scene is laid in an open space near the city gate. Sáwa, with his court, soldiers, and people, enter in solemn procession, and after them comes the royal victim, wearing bridal robes, and attended by maidens who scatter flowers in her path, and sing their old song of love's sweetness. Ilmas, led to the centre of the open space, kneels down, the executioner stands by her side, and all gaze steadily at a watchman on the gate, who will give the death signal by lifting his hand as the sun sets. Suspense ends in a very unexpected manner. The watchman, turning to the throng below, proclaims the rapid approach of an Arab of the hills. General astonishment prevails, and in the midst of wonder and admiration, Sayid gallops through the gateway and draws rein before the Prince. His first act is to kneel in adoring gratitude before Ilmas, who declares that, though he perish, his name and deed will be cherished in her heart. Here Sáwa intervenes, bidding Sayid live and be his friend, the drama then ending with a general invocation of Love the Conqueror.

Such is the story of Sayid, and it has given the composer opportunities for dramatic effect of which, we may venture to say, he has made good use. Mr. Mackenzie appears to have modified his style somewhat in this work. The details are less elaborated, the lines of each number are broader, and the expression more direct and simple than in previous efforts. Representative themes are used very sparingly indeed, nothing of independence in treating each situation as it arises being sacrificed to them, and the orchestra, though always interesting and duly prominent, rarely, if ever, draws to itself disproportionate attention. We are glad to note, further, that Mr. Mackenzie here shows an advance in the art of writing vocal melody which attracts and pleases without drawing upon the trite or the commonplace. In point of fact, we may venture an opinion that in the “Story of Sayid” Mr. Mackenzie appears at his best; encouraging hopes of further progress towards the highest position. In writing for the chief personages of the story, the composer shows much felicity of characterisation. The music of Ilmas, for example, is full of tenderness and devotion; while the chivalric nature of the Arab chief could not be better expressed. The choruses are very powerful and marked by a direct conveyance of great feeling, and the two movements for the orchestra alone—marches both—have strong local colour to heighten their interest. Our opinion of the work may be modified on hearing, but we offer it as above without much misgiving of premature judgment.

Longfellow's “Golden Legend” has naturally, and frequently, attracted the notice of composers on the look out for a subject. A few have dealt with it, though their works have not in all cases reached even the dignity of print, but the majority have found the question of adaptation a serious one. The original poem contains such a mass of varied matter, and is divided into so many scenes, each containing something not to be omitted, that the difficulty appears, at first sight, insurmountable. One thing is clear—to compress the story within the dimensions of a cantata very much must be sacrificed, and a great deal of re-arrangement made. Mr. Joseph Bennett, who undertook the adaptation for Sir Arthur Sullivan, did not shrink from these exigencies. With the exception of the Prologue, with its fine musical opportunities, and its foreshadowing of Lucifer's defeat in his designs upon Elsie and Prince Henry, all the mystical parts of the poem were got rid of at a stroke; the plan being rigidly limited to the story of the two principal characters, from which nothing material is absent. The re-arrangement of certain scenes has been boldly done, with a view to the incorporation of the best lyrics, and out of regard for musical effect. It may be claimed, however, that the course of the story is never obscured. There are six scenes, besides a prologue and epilogue. The prologue is taken just as it stands in the poem, and so are the incidents of the first scene, in which Lucifer appears to the sick and despairing Prince, successfully tempting him with alcohol. Here the adapter has done no more than select the lines for musical treatment. The second scene is made up of fragments from several scenes in the original. It opens before the cottage of Ursula at eventide—the cottage in which Prince Henry, now deposed and an outcast, has taken refuge. The villagers sing an Evening Hymn ere dispersing to their homes, and the Prince's voice is heard joining in the “Amen.” The sound touches the heart of Ursula's daughter, Elsie, who, when left alone with her mother, expresses a desire to die for his sake, that the cure promised under such conditions by the medical school of Salerno may be effected. Ursula piteously combats the idea, but retires into the house wondering whether it be a Divine prompting. Elsie then prays for strength to carry out her purpose, and, on the Prince entering, offers him her life. Henry accepts the gift, and asks God to bless the giver—a prayer to which the angels respond “Amen.” The third scene, like the second, is a compilation. It shows Elsie, Prince Henry, and attendants on their way to Salerno, where the sacrifice of the maiden and the cure of the man are to be effected. They encounter a band of pilgrims, among whom is Lucifer disguised as a friar. He, too, is bound for Salerno, where he has business with our travellers. Parting from the pilgrims the Prince's train journeys on, and, when night falls, encamps on a height overlooking the sea. In all this there is little incident, the main object of the scene, besides advancing the story one step, being to include the many beautiful lyrics fairly admissible into it, and thus give the composer a splendid opportunity. The fourth scene is laid at the Medical School of Salerno, and follows the original closely. Lucifer is shown in the form of a physician, Friar Angelo. He receives the Prince and Elsie, takes the maiden into an inner room, notwithstanding the entreaties of Henry (who now protests that he never meant her to die), and is only prevented from carrying out his purpose when the Prince and his attendants, bursting in the door, rescue the willing victim. The fifth scene—at the cottage of Ursula—contains an announcement to the anxious mother that the Prince has been miraculously healed, and that Elsie is not only living, but reserved for a nobler fate. A prayer of thanksgiving follows. The last scene of all is laid on the terrace of the Prince's Castle of Vautsburg. It is the evening of Henry and Elsie's marriage day, and the best portions of Longfellow's charming dialogue are uttered by the happy pair in a long duet. Then comes the Epilogue, comparing Elsie's noble devotion to the beneficent course of a mountain brook flowing from snow-pure heights to fertilise the arid valley below.

In the book of the "Golden Legend," as thus laid out, there is obviously less of dramatic action than lyrical feeling. It abounds with the last-named quality, and this may chiefly have attracted Sir Arthur Sullivan's regard, that composer being uniformly at his best when dealing with it. The result is a long series of solo and concerted pieces, in which the delicate sentiment, keen appreciation of shades of emotion, and elegance of expression which distinguish our countryman are felicitously shown. It is very obvious that Sir Arthur has put some of his best work into the Leeds Cantata. The Prologue alone gives proof of the fact. No small difficulty attends the adequate setting of such a text. The raging hate of Lucifer, as he urges on his spirits to assail the Cathedral, their awed expressions of impotence in face of the sacred powers that guard the building, the voices of the bells, the despairing flight of the demons, and the triumphant hymn of the choir make up a scene which puts a composer's fancy and skill to no ordinary test. We think it will be found that Sir Arthur Sullivan has come out of the ordeal with success. The setting of the Prologue is not elaborated in the sturm und drang fashion affected by many modern musicians. It is never obscure and never incoherent; seeking rather to attain the desired expression by use of means simple and clear. So should all music be written. This, indeed, is the secret of highest art, and Sir Arthur has availed himself of it. We note the same thing in other parts of the Cantata where dramatic force is required—as, for example, where Prince Henry and his followers rescue Elsie from the pretended doctor. But these are exceptional cases. The prevailing tone of the work is lyrical, and into it Sir Arthur has infused all the charm of his keen feeling and graceful utterance. He has succeeded, moreover, in the difficult task of characterisation, particularly as regards Lucifer. Only once—when the Fiend, as a pilgrim, sings a mocking song—do we meet with the traditional music of such a part. At other times Lucifer is attended in the orchestra by strains of an academic and formal type, quite in keeping with his assumed character as a learned physician. The idea is a happy one, and by no means deficient in the quiet humour of which our composer possesses such a store. Elsie's music, in its purity of style and tenderness of expression, aptly reflects the beautiful character of the devoted girl, while that of Ursula and Prince Henry equally accords with its object. Some of the choral music is elaborate, and in the Epilogue we have an ensemble of fullest dimensions and most ambitious character—perhaps the greatest thing of the kind Sir Arthur has yet achieved. It is needless to add that the orchestration is fanciful, bright, and highly coloured throughout. The opinions just stated will, we expect, receive ample confirmation when the work becomes known. Till that time we must leave the question whether or no the composer has, in places, fallen short of the requirements of his theme.

Mr. Villiers Stanford's choral setting of Tennyson's "The Revenge, a Ballad of the Fleet," derives immense advantage from its subject. The blood must be sluggish indeed which does not quicken its flow when the story of Sir Richard Grenville's deed is recited. One almost doubts the unassailable record of history on reading how the little Revenge, with half her crew sick, sailed into the midst of the Spanish fleet and fought them successfully the whole night long, beating off one big ship after another, till the Dons, their guns silent, gathered round and contemplated their adversary in mute amazement. Tennyson, as everybody knows, has told the story in spirited verse, and now Mr. Stanford has set it to spirited music. We expect that this Choral Ballad will become a favourite with choirs and public alike. There is a bright tone of British manhood in the music as well as in the words—none the less because, when devising his themes, the composer adopted the traditional style and character of the nautical ditty. Hence the melodies are of that breezy, hearty sort which alone can be regarded as appropriate to such a case. The more descriptive passages, dealing with the fight, &c., are powerfully written, and here the orchestra comes into play with advantage, but, indeed, the entire work is adequate to its stirring subject, and, probably, will do as much for Mr. Stanford's popularity as the best of his more ambitious efforts.

There remains to notice Mr. F. K. Hattersley's Concert Overture, which will represent local talent at the Leeds Festival. It is a work constructed strictly on classic lines, and consists of a slow Introduction, having a theme which appears in the Allegro following. The music is thoughtfully written, and does credit both to the composer's natural ability and his training. We observe in it melodic invention, command of form, careful attention to contrast, and good judgment in the matter of climax. These are excellences upon which a young man may be congratulated, and we anticipate a gratifying result from Mr. Hattersley's first Festival appearance.

MUSICAL TALENT IN IRELAND.

The claims of the Irish to a higher rank among the musical races of the world than their neighbours on this side of St. George's Channel are just as frequently advanced by the latter as by themselves, whether on the principle of omne ignotum pro magnifico, or from a characteristic diffidence in their own artistic instincts, it is hard to say. Perhaps, therefore, as an Irishman who has enjoyed good opportunities of judging of the musical capacities of both countries, I may be entitled to a hearing on this matter. My views can hardly fail to wound the susceptibilities of those patriots who claim for Ireland in the present day the same intellectual pre-eminence that she undoubtedly enjoyed in the dark ages; while, in so far as they recognise the sound taste and excellent achievement of English performers, they are not likely to meet acceptance amongst those critics and connoisseurs who apply a geographical gauge to decide the merits of a musical composition and invariably proceed upon the axiom that what is native is null. Before setting out, however, on this dangerous path, in fact, per ignes—

Suppositos cineri doloso,

I should like to call the attention of such of my readers as have hitherto been taught to believe that the names of the seven notes of the gamut were suggested by the initial syllables of the six hemistichs and the initial letters of the two words of the last line of a stanza in the Sapphic metre to St. John, by Guido of Arezzo,* to the following version of the origin of the same names. It is given in an ancient Irish MS. tract, several centuries old, and runs as follows: "The reason why the word puncta (puncta) is so called, is because the points (or musical notes) ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, hurt the devil and puncture him. And it is thus that these points are to be understood—viz., when Moses, the son of Amram, with his people in their exodus were crossing the Red Sea, and Pharaoh and his host were following him, this was the chant which Moses had to protect him from Pharaoh and his host—these six points in praise of the Lord:—

"The first of these, i.e., ut; and ut in the Greek is the same as liberat in the Latin; and that is the same as saer in the Gaelic; i.e., O God, said Moses, deliver us from the harm of the devil.

"The second point of them, i.e., re; and re is the same as saer; i.e., O God, deliver us from everything hurtful and malignant.

"The third point, i.e., mi; and mi in the Greek is the same as militum in the Latin; and that is the same as ridere (a knight) in the Gaelic; i.e., O God, said Moses, deliver us from those knights who are pursuing us.

"The fourth point, i.e., fa; and fa in the Greek is the same as famulus in the Latin; and that is the same as mug (slave) in the Gaelic; i.e., O God, said Moses, deliver us from those slaves who are pursuing us.

"The fifth point, i.e., sol; and sol is the same as grian (sun); and that is the same as righteousness: because righteousness and Christ are not different; i.e., O Christ, said Moses, deliver us.

"The sixth point, i.e., la, is the same as lav, and that is the same as indail (wash); i.e., O God, said Moses, wash away our sins from us.

"And on the singing of that laud (i.e., chant) Pharaoh and his host were drowned." ("Hermathena," Vol. iii., pp. 244-5.)

The scholarship and etymology of the Irish antiquary who is responsible for this extraordinary explanation may be called in question, but his good faith is unmistakable and the context affords no trace whatsoever of any intention to impose on the reader. Scarcely less preposterous than the foregoing are the statements gravely propounded at the present day by writers who construe a refusal to admit the prehistoric antiquity of Irish art into an unpatriotic act of the deepest dye. I have before me, as I write, the report of a "Lecture on Irish Music," recently delivered near Dublin, in which the following passages occur,

"Ireland was not unjustly called the 'land of song.' She alone of all the nations had a musical instrument as her national emblem, while the flags of other nations were emblazoned with ravenous beasts and birds of prey." With equal justice the intelligence of the Scotch might be disparaged on the score of their having for their national emblem a plant which, as Mr. Grant Allen informs us, heralds and botanists agree in identifying with the small cottony donkey thistle. But to return to our lecturer. "The Irish people showed a higher musical sensibility than any other nation, and their musical traditions went further back than those of the Greeks. They possessed something much more real and definite than the vague classic fables. Long before the time to which other modern nations could trace the history of their civilisation, music appeared to have been cultivated with singular devotion in Ireland." If it were not that writers who indulge in this thrasonical vein were generally incorrigible, it might be well to recommend to this lecturer the perusal of such a work as the first two volumes of Mr. Rowbotham's "History of Music," in which he would learn a good deal about the music of races more ancient even than the Irish. The bard, again, of whom so much is made by the same authority, was quite as much of a poet or maker of improvised verses as a musician, perhaps even more. The musical part of his performance was in all probability of a simple and rudimentary character, being confined to a brief prelude and an occasional chord by way of accompaniment, and the mere fact of the harp, an instrument essentially diatonic in its character, being the national instrument inclines the impartial critic to rate the nation who owned it lower in the scale than those peoples whose music was represented by stringed instruments capable of greater variety and more elaborate execution.

But after all, the musical capacity of any nation is not to be decided by vague references to a heroic past, or bold generalisations founded upon insufficient data. If the Irish, as their so-called leaders lose no occasion of impressing upon them, are in no respect degenerate scions of their sires, but rather entitled to use in their persons the famous Homeric boast—

there should be no difficulty in forming an estimate of what their ancient music was like, in so far as the performances of peasants in the outlying districts may be held to reproduce the leading characteristics of that music. It will then remain for us to examine briefly the achievements and capacity of recent and contemporary Irish musicians, and finally to attempt to indicate in what direction their past performances and present promise seem to point.

According to a recent visitor to Ireland, a French writer who has lately published his experiences under the title of "Le Rève de Paddy et le Cauchemar de John Bull," the old Irish harper is by no means a thing of the past in the Green Isle. M. Saint-Thomas—the writer in question—must have been in luck, for it has never been my good fortune to encounter the "old harper" yet. I do not say that he is extinct, but merely that he is as rare as a white jackdaw. Fiddlers are fairly plentiful still, and in considerable request at bonfires, weddings, or at the cross roads where the boys and girls of the village come to dance on Sunday afternoons, but I have never yet known an Irish rustic fiddler who produced a tolerable tone, or possessed any knowledge of, or instinct for, harmony. As time-keepers they are excellent, and the tunes which they play are spirited and characteristic. The tune of "Father O'Flynn," for example, was picked up by ear in this way from a Kerry fiddler and

* Ut queant laxis Resonare fibris
Mira gestorum Famuli tuorum
Solve polluti Labii reatum.

Sancte Ioannes.

noted down from the whistling of the gentleman who had so heard it. It will therefore be readily understood that as a jig-tune it is played nearly twice as fast as it is sung by Mr. Santley, whose brogue is so good, by the way, that I wonder he has not been claimed as a native of Ireland by my compatriots. The performance of the peasant instrumentalist then is limited entirely to the sphere of dance music. He never indulges in independent rhapsodies or improvisations, nor is he in the habit of furnishing an accompaniment to the voice. Whether the "old harper" does this or not I am not in a position to state. The only other rustic instrumental music that I can call to mind was that discoursed by an itinerant cornet-player, and occasional manipulators of the banjo. The history of the former was peculiar. A German by birth, he had settled in Ireland—if an itinerant cornet-player may be said to settle—and became content to accept the Hibernicised form of Cloyne which his patronymic, Klein, took in the mouths of his hosts. He spoke slightly broken English, with a decided Cork accent, but was not otherwise remarkable. Nor do the banjo-players call for special comment. The Ethiopian rhapsody—though doubtless of immense antiquity, and introduced by the Phœnician mariners in their voyages to the Cassiterides; or, better still, by one of the followers of Memnon, shipwrecked on his return from the Trojan war (such hypotheses are scarcely more absurd than those seriously put forward by some Irish antiquaries)—I have always preferred to regard as a foreign import rather than an indigenous growth. In some of the country towns local brass bands do exist, but of quite phenomenal badness. It was my misfortune once to live in a street where one of these associations held their practices, and the cacophony was something indescribable. The story of the Kenmare brass band, the members of which, on the occasion of the visit of Lord and Lady Aberdeen, sat up nearly all night to practise "God save the Queen"—an air with which they were quite unfamiliar—and of which they gave a far from perfect rendering on the following day, is not the invention of a witty journalist; it is a very fairly correct statement of what actually occurred. On these grounds, therefore, it is slightly presumptuous to claim for the Irish a superior "musical sensibility" to that possessed by the Hungarians or the Bohemians, who have been described as a nation of "born fiddlers." Vocal music, however, as practised by the Irish peasantry, probably affords a better clue to the character of the compositions of the heroic epoch. Let me, however, clear the ground by exploding a very popular fallacy in regard to Irish vocal music. As sure as ever the subject is mooted in mixed company some one—a lady for choice—will say, "Oh, yes! Moore's Irish Melodies, so lovely!" Now I shall not be far out when I say that Moore's Irish Melodies are, in spite of their politics, almost exclusively, with one or two rare exceptions, the heritage of the "classes" rather than the "masses." Their artificial sentiment is out of place in the mouths of the peasantry; and even the airs, charming and pathetic though they are, are more mannered and regular (at least in the form in which we know them) than the wild and barbaric tunes which may be heard to this day in Kerry and Connemara. And here I may insert an observation made to me the other day by an intelligent friend, to the effect that he was not aware of the existence of any national music inside the pale, an extremely generous observation for a Loyalist to make, and out of which the Nationalists might think to suck no small advantage. If you want, then, to draw from the well of Irish music undefiled, you should get a peasant—hailing, say, from the barony of South Dunkerron—to sing to you in Irish, and even though you cannot pronounce the result attractive, you will at least admit that it is both interesting and impressive. Plaintive and stormy, like the wind on their coasts, these Kerry ditties have something unique about them, and the strange guttural sound of the words, delivered in gusts and dying away in a sort of drone, has a weird and indescribable effect. Besides these songs, sung altogether in Irish, I have heard others of a bi-lingual character, the stanzas being in Irish and English alternately, and finally, a great number of songs in English, the idiom of some of which proves them to be translations from the Irish, while the style of all abounds in those turns of speech so characteristic of the Celtic genius. All of these songs are racy of the soil and typical of Irish music. I have collected a fair number of the words, and occasionally noted down an air. Edwin Waugh, the Lancashire poet, gives a very good specimen of a rambling ballad of this sort in his Irish sketches. A "gillie" who used to accompany me salmon-fishing a few years back had a great store of such songs, including several anti-landlord ballads set to old airs. One of the most amusing of his collection was a dolorous ditty recounting the romantic history of a young lady of Youghal, who became enamoured of a sailor named Jimmee, who was, unfortunately, "below her in degree." When her stern father got wind of this he threatened either to kill or transport Jimmee. Accordingly the lady sent secretly for her lover to break the sad tidings to him. In obedience to her summons Jimmee comes and creeps stealthily up the stairs to her bower in his "stocking vamps." Here he receives from her lips the statement of her father's nefarious designs, and the song comes to an abrupt conclusion. The following is a little song which, within a very small compass, yet manages to illustrate two characteristic features of primitive Irish music—ornamentation by the means of trills and turns and the drumming repetition of the tonic at the close:—

And I will hire	a little boat,
And on the o - cean	I will float,
And I will ax them	as passes by,
If they have seen	my sailor boy.

It is but fair to add that the descending triplets only give an approximate notion of the embellishment so common in airs of the sort. As sung, the intervals do not admit of being reduced to strict notation. The voice, produced through the nose, descends in a succession of twiddles from the dominant to the tonic, and dies away in a sort of sob. Any account of the rural vocal music of Ireland would be incomplete which did not make mention of another class of songs which, I am sorry to say, are a good deal in vogue amongst the more travelled section of the peasantry—I mean stale English popular—i.e., music-hall—songs, five or ten or twenty years old, the vulgarity of which is perhaps slightly veiled by the accent in which they are uttered. This is all the more remarkable when we consider how rich Ireland is in really comic songs. We may perhaps find a parallel case in the practice of Oriental workmen who, as has been noticed of late years, will often prefer to employ vulgar European patterns and shapes in place of their own beautiful designs. I may close this portion of my paper by adding that such a thing as part-singing is unheard of amongst the rural population of Ireland. In this respect the Irish are a long way behind the Welsh, who seem to have an instinctive feeling for harmony, or the dwellers in some of the midland and northern counties of England. The comparatively sparse nature of the population of Ireland may have a good deal to say to this. At any rate, the great centres of choral singing, in Yorkshire and Wales, are coincident with districts where the density of the population renders co-operation an easy matter. At the same time, temperament and physical aptitude must count for a good deal, and in neither of these respects can the Irish of the present day maintain their right to the title of the "Land of Song." When we come to review the achievements of individual Irishmen in the domain of music we find that to the roll of British composers and artists, the sister isle contributes perhaps a larger share than her numbers would warrant us to expect. There is Balfe, in whom some critics see the great protagonist of native art. "Should English opera ever be established on a thoroughly national footing," writes Mr. Brown in his "Dictionary of Musicians," lately noticed in these columns, "it will be necessary to draw largely on the many works which Balfe has produced." Reactions must be expected in music as in other departments, and the success of Nessler's operas in Germany may be taken in evidence of this. But to the mind of most critics the revival of Balfe's operas, with their imperfect orchestration, common-place melody, and grotesque libretti, would be little short of a portent. Gifted he undoubtedly was, but he wrote for his time, not for all time, and the verdict which has shelved nine-tenths of his works is not likely to be reversed. Lover, except in the opinion of ultra-patriots, hardly deserves serious attention as a composer, and yet the rich humour of his words makes us willingly shut our eyes to the faultiness of his workmanship, his infantile accompaniments and conventional melody. His songs reflect with the greatest happiness the harum-scarum, happy-go-lucky, side of Irish character, and a good selection of them, with revised accompaniments, would be a welcome addition to the scanty répertoire of humorous music, wholly free from the odious buffoonery of the music hall. Of Moore I have already spoken, and of the reasons for denying him the title of a national poet, to which Lover has really a better claim. Coming down to our own times, it would be impertinent for me to do more than point to the great talents in their different spheres of Sir Arthur Sullivan and Dr. Stanford, as a proof of the achievements of which Irishmen are capable in the field of composition. But I may be allowed to remark how the careers of both these distinguished musicians illustrate the dependence of Irish genius on foreign surroundings. In the present state of affairs this could hardly be otherwise, for the Irish capital does not support a good orchestra, it is sadly in want of a good Concert hall, while the notorious cliquishness of Dublin musical society, owing to the lack of an entente cordiale between the chief musical authorities, has sadly hindered the progress of the art in that classic city. Few Irish names are to be found in the ranks of distinguished instrumentalists or executants, and we have already adverted to the lack of a first rate Irish chorus. On the other hand, Ireland is very well represented amongst the distinguished solo vocalists of the day. Without making any pretence at completeness, it will suffice to mention the names of Signor Poli, Messrs. Barton McGuckin, Crotty, Ludwig, and Mrs. Hutchinson. The promise given by Irish pupils who are carrying on their studies in London, again, is decidedly encouraging, for it is obvious to all who attend the Royal College Concerts that in the three departments of pianoforte playing, composition, and singing the Hibernians are in the first flight.

So far as the past and present afford us means of judging of the future, it would seem as though the Irish were rather destined to achieve musical distinction by rare individual eminence than high average excellence. Berlioz has told us that the multitude of its musicians does not make a nation musical, and this is a true saying. But, at the same time, the value of co-operation in music cannot be denied, and the want of a good orchestra in Ireland is a standing reproach which her patriotic citizens should do their utmost to remove. It is a want, however, which is highly significant of the music of the country, which has always been stronger in its melody than its harmony, and it would not be difficult to establish an analogy for this in other fields where the Irish character finds scope for development. For example, cricket and football both need co-operation on the part of the players if they would succeed, and neither of these games have ever taken proper root among the people in Ireland. Individualism, in so far as it means the self-assertion of genius and emancipation from conventionality, is a principle of vital importance in music as elsewhere. But it can also stand for isolation, for sporadic and disorganised efforts. Both these sides of individualism, the good and the evil, are familiar to the observer of Irish art, and it is only by a due recognition of the opposing principle of collective effort that the evil can be counteracted and fruitful work achieved. Those ardent advocates of nationality who spend so much time on vain efforts to propagate the study of the Irish tongue, or to revive forgotten Celtic sports, would do far better if they were to devote their energies to the establishment of a really efficient Musical Academy in Dublin, and thus take practical steps towards confirming and justifying their often heard claims to be considered a musical people.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

NO. XIX.—GEORGES BIZET.*

THERE is no reason why these sketches should be limited to the composers conventionally termed "great," nor, in the case of the author of "Carmen," can good reasons be shown against the use of the word. Bizet was cut off in the very dawn of his career. He achieved little, because the opportunity was denied him, but in that little he accomplished much; giving to music the most original and successful opera of the day, and by a single effort earning an undying name. This is his passport to the present series of biographical notices, and nobody can contest its validity.

Bizet came of a musical family, and breathed the atmosphere of art from his birth. His father gave singing lessons in Paris, and his mother's sister, Madame Delsarte, a premier prix of the Conservatoire, enjoyed reputation as a pianist. Circumstances were favourable, therefore, for the child of music who entered the world on October 25, 1838. In baptism, the future composer was named Alexandre César Léopold—a tremendous appellation, which might have weighed him down through life, had not a sensible godfather, having, as we may suppose, sullenly acquiesced at the font, persisted ever after in calling him Georges. Georges he became to all his friends and acquaintances; Alexandre César Léopold being reserved for occasions on which the law demanded strict accuracy.

* For much of the material in this biographical sketch the writer is indebted to M. Edmond Halpé's Georges Bizet, Souvenirs et Correspondance, and especially to M. Charles Pigot's recently published work, Georges Bizet et son Œuvre.

Little Bizet was only four years old when his mother began teaching him at once the alphabet of letters and of music. He could distinguish the degrees of the scale as soon as his A B C, and, it would seem, took much more kindly to the first than the second. Moreover, when his father was engaged in giving lessons, little Georges would hover about the door of the room, picking up stray bits of knowledge, and assimilating them with remarkable digestive powers. He was, in fact, a musical child—a phenomenon happily not so rare as that any one of us is unable to imagine, in some degree, the ways and means with which he satisfied his inborn appetite. When Georges reached the age of eight his father took him in hand, and, we are told, experienced no small surprise on discovering how far the little boy had turned previous and, so to speak, unofficial opportunities to account. M. Pigot says:—

“One day when he made him sing a solfeggio, bristling with difficult intervals, he was struck with the accurate way in which the child attacked the different intonations, never making the least mistake. He raises his eyes, and saw that those of the young pupil were wandering far away from the copy open on the desk. The child, having no suspicion that his master had observed this, continued to sol-fa without reading a note. He had often heard this lesson through the door, and could repeat it exactly.”

Finding that he had a musical prize in Georges, Bizet père pushed on his studies with ardour, teaching him harmony and the pianoforte, till, in a year, it was felt that the lad should be entrusted to other hands. The father naturally desired to place his son at the Conservatoire, but this could only be done at the time by infringing the rules of that institution, Georges not having reached the required age. It was, nevertheless, determined to make an effort, trusting that the interest excited by so clever a child would prompt the authorities to wink at an evasion of the law. The elder Bizet, therefore, spoke to his friend, M. Alizard, of the Opéra, and the two, taking the child with them, went to M. Meifred, a member of the Conservatoire committee on studies. Victor Wilder told the story of this interview when writing an obituary notice of Bizet in the Ménestrel, and it runs as follows:—“Your child is very young,” said Meifred, looking the little fellow all over with a disdainful grimace. ‘That’s true,’ answered the father, not the least disconcerted, ‘but if he is little by measurement, he is great by knowledge.’ ‘Really! and what can he do?’ ‘Place yourself at the piano, strike chords, and he will name them all without a mistake.’ The test was at once applied. Standing with his back to the instrument, the child unhesitatingly named all the chords which he heard, though some of them were purposely far-fetched; at the same time, with surprising ease, he rapidly called out the members of each chord as they lay under the fingers. Meifred could not restrain a burst of admiration. ‘My boy,’ he exclaimed, ‘you are on the high road to the Institute.’”

The result was that the doors of the Conservatoire opened to the gifted child out of due time, and he was allowed to attend Marmontel's pianoforte class, although the number of students was complete. He was soon definitely admitted, and, six months later, took the first prize in solfeggio, thus attracting the attention of the venerable master, Zimmermann, under whom he passed for counterpoint and fugue. Having now fairly entered upon his student career, Bizet began the achievement of a series of distinguished successes. In 1851, at his first competition, he took second prize for piano, being then thirteen years old, and in the following year he divided the first prize with another. He thus rapidly mounted to the highest place, his playing being spoken of by his master, Marmontel, in terms of special admiration. Bizet made equal progress on the organ, under Benoit, winning the second prize in 1854, and carrying off the first in 1855. His organ studies naturally brought him under the influence of Sebastian Bach, of whom he was a fervent and passionate disciple. For Beethoven, also, he cherished a profound admiration, but the older master was his special idol. He would often gather his friends around the pianoforte and play to them the Cantor's fugues. At such times, it is said, “he had the air, with his sympathetic physiognomy and charming profile, of a young pontiff initiating the faithful into the mysterious rites of some new cult—the cult of Art, greatest and most beautiful of religions.”

Zimmermann dying in 1853 (Gounod took his class during illness), Bizet passed under the instruction of Halévy, who prompted the young man to compete at once for the Grand Prix de Rome. Georges, however, took a more modest view of his powers, and held back till 1856, when he made up his mind to enter into the struggle. The cantata imposed was called “David,” and upon this the concurrents laboured with a result which satisfied none of them. That is to say, the first prize was withheld altogether. The second fell to our young hero. M. Pigot asserts that he would have received the first but for his youth, and the opinion of the judges that another year under Halévy would do him most good. That year, however, was not to pass in study alone. Jacques Offenbach, then director of the Bouffes-Parisiens, put an operetta up to competition, and undertook to produce the successful work. Bizet at once resolved to avail himself of this unexpected opening to fame, if not to fortune, and on receiving the libretto of “Doctor Miracle” he set to work with ardour. In the result, he was bracketed, at the head of the competition, with a classmate, M. Lecocq, of whom the world has since heard. Both works were performed, turn and turn about, and both the young men felt the first round of ambition's ladder under their feet. But here they parted company. Bizet went on to better things than farcical opera; Lecocq could not resist its vulgar attraction. The same year Bizet won the longed-for Prix de Rome with a setting of a cantata entitled “Clovis et Clotilde.” This work was solemnly performed at the Académie des Beaux Arts, according to usage, and, with applause ringing in his ears, our young laureate shortly set out for the Eternal City.

Bizet arrived in Rome on January 28, 1858, there to take up his residence for two years. He laboured hard, and first forwarded to Paris, in discharge of his obligation to compose a certain number of works, an Italian opéra-bouffe, “Don Procopio.” This was officially pronounced at the Académie to be distinguished by an easy and brilliant touch, and a style youthful and bold. The score is now lost, as it was not the custom, five-and-twenty years ago, to catalogue and preserve the compositions sent from Rome by holders of the Grand Prix. In August, 1859, Bizet made a trip to Naples, taking with him a letter of recommendation which Carafa had written to Mercadante in case of such an opportunity. The story of that letter is amusing. Anxious to be perfectly free as a sight-seer, Bizet did not at once present himself to the aged chief of the Neapolitan Conservatoire, and, at last, the hour of departure came without his having found time to do so. He grieved over this, as abusing the kindness of Carafa; but the feeling did not survive when curiosity prompted him to open the envelope. He read this: “My old friend,—I strongly recommend to you the bearer of this letter,

M. Bizet, laureate of our Institute. He is a charming young man, a good fellow, worthy of all sympathy, but, between ourselves, he has not a rag of talent."

At the close of his second year in Rome Bizet sought and obtained permission to spend a third year there, instead of travelling in Germany, as required by the conditions of the Grand Prix. He was happy in his Italian life, and, as the old heroes of German music, whom he adored, were no less accessible in Rome than in Leipzig, the young man failed to see how he was likely to benefit by removal. This matter settled, Bizet began to prepare for the second of the compositions he was under obligation to send to Paris, and decided upon a Choral Symphony, the subject suggested by the "Lusiade" of Camoëns. Then arose the usual difficulty about a poet. He found one at last, but the result was not happy. "I have put my hand," he wrote to his old master, Marmontel, "upon a certain D—, a well-informed Frenchman, but deficient in taste. I am obliged to re-write part of his verses, which does not amuse me, especially as I see with terror that my poetry is infinitely better than his." Nevertheless, the work was done somehow, the music composed and "Vasco de Gama," a descriptive Symphony with choruses, duly forwarded to the Institute. It was performed in Paris some years later, and has been published since the master's death.

Bizet's third work under the conditions of the Grand Prix was an Orchestral Suite, consisting of a Scherzo and Andante Marche Funèbre. This was performed at the Institute when the prizes of 1861 were distributed. The Scherzo had a great success, and was afterwards incorporated into the Symphony "Souvenirs de Rome." As for the Funeral March, it appears to be still in MS., but its principal theme is reproduced in the third act of "Les Pêcheurs de Perles." His term in Rome having ended, the young man set out for Paris, little expecting the shock that awaited him. At Venice he received news that his mother was dangerously ill. Hurrying home with all possible speed, he found his beloved parent on her death bed, and in a few days all was over. Apropos, M. Pigot very justly writes: "After three years of separation, to see his mother in mortal agony, and then to lose her for ever! One comprehends without difficulty the grief of the poor boy, who, at the threshold of his career, when all appeared to smile upon him, and he believed himself completely happy, had his heart lacerated by the most cruel woe—a sorrow the most terrible and unforeseen. He learned then that happiness is not of this world, that the strong man must reckon with the cruel surprises of fate, and courageously, stoically, he addressed himself to the struggle." That Bizet was a good and loving son is evident from the beautiful letter he addressed to his parents just before the last New Year's Day which saw the family circle unbroken:—

"My letter starts so as to reach you on New Year's Day, my dear parents. Now let me send you all my wishes. I begin by desiring for both of you the perfect health of body without which health of mind is not possible. Next, I hope that money, the frightful metal beneath whose sway we all are, will not be wanting to you. As to this I have a little plan: When I possess a hundred thousand francs, papa shall give no more lessons. Nor will I. We will begin the life of rentiers—not a bad thing. A hundred thousand francs! It is nothing; only two successes at the Opéra Comique. Lastly, I desire to love you always with all my heart, and to be ever, as to-day, the most affectionate of sons."

After reading these words, it is easy to understand that Bizet's first great grief must have torn rudely at his heart-strings.

Settled down in Paris, the young musician found himself face to face with the necessity of earning a living, and with very little prospect of the two successes at the Opéra Comique. He began by making arrangements and transcriptions for the pianoforte, no less than 150 of which were published by Heugel under the title "Pianiste Chanteur." He worked also at the little one-act piece in which it was usual for the returned Prix de Rome to show of what metal he was made. This was called "La Guzla de l'Emir," and its rehearsals were taking place at the Opéra Comique when an event happened which changed the whole situation.

The then Minister of Fine Arts, Count Walewski, being dissatisfied with the circumstances amid which the returned holders of the Prix de Rome found themselves, and desiring to afford them encouragement and opportunity, granted a subvention of 100,000 francs to the Lyrique, then presided over by M. Carvalho, on condition that a three-act opera by a Grand Prix was produced each year. Carvalho had met Bizet and had been charmed, not only by the young man's personal graces and addresses, but by his obviously superior talent. At once, therefore, he offered him the first work under the new arrangement, and handed over a libretto, entitled "Les Pêcheurs de Perles," the production of MM. Carré and Carmon. Wild with delight, Bizet went straight to the Opéra Comique and withdrew his "Guzla de l'Emir," wisely anxious not to run the risk of compromising himself in view of the more important venture. Besides, he wished to make his début with an example of higher art than a musical farce, and unquestionably he was right. "Guzla de l'Emir" afterwards made no further sign. Nobody knows what became of it, but the libretto was subsequently set to music by Théodore Dubois and represented at the Athénée. M. Pigot assumes that Bizet's work was burnt by himself. He says:—"Sometime before his death—perhaps with a prevision of the end—he made an auto da fé of all the manuscripts which appeared to him short of perfection; he destroyed with pitiless hand all that seemed unworthy to survive; doubtless with injustice to works of incontestable interest and great artistic flavour."

While engaged upon "Les Pêcheurs" Bizet's name came twice or thrice before the public. The Scherzo of his Suite was performed at the Cirque Napoléon, under Padeloup (January 11, 1863), who ventured to associate his young countryman with Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, and was mercilessly baited for his pains. The audience hissed; the subscribers protested; the press criticised. Who was Bizet that he should be forced upon such illustrious company, and his music be thrust in where only classic art should reign? The same Scherzo was better received at a Concert of the Société Nationale des Beaux Arts, through whom, also, his "Vasco de Gama" obtained a hearing, but concert-going Parisians were not, on the whole, favourable to the new man, the less because he was charged with a leaning to Wagnerism. M. Pigot makes a spirited defence of his hero against this accusation, claiming that he never ceased to be absolutely individual, that he belonged to the great race of Weber, Mendelssohn, and their fellows, and had nothing in common with the master of Bayreuth. It would serve little purpose to discuss the matter here, but readers may be interested in a letter written by Bizet to Galabert after attending a general rehearsal of "Rienzi." It was first published in the recipient's brochure, "Georges Bizet: Souvenirs et Correspondance":—

"They began at eight o'clock; they finished at two. Eighty instrumentalists in the orchestra; thirty on the stage. A hundred and thirty choristers; five hundred supernumeraries. Work badly constructed; only a single rôle—that of Rienzi, remarkably played by Monjaue. An uproar, of which nothing can give an idea. A mixture of Italian themes; style bad and bizarre; music of the decadence rather than of the future. Some numbers detestable; others admirable. On the whole, an astonishing work, wonderfully alive, an Olympian grandeur and inspiration. Will it be a success? I do not know. The house was full; no claque. Effects prodigious! Effects disastrous! Cries of enthusiasm: then dead silence for half-an-hour!"

The fact appears to be, and this letter indicates it, that Bizet was a discreet critic of Wagner, and declined to be prejudiced for or against him—an example which his countrymen, unhappily, do not follow.

"Les Pêcheurs de Perles" was produced at the Lyrique, September 29, 1863, the public listening, we are told, with more surprise than pleasure. The style was new to them, and audacious into the bargain. It was even original enough to be offensive; nevertheless, the composer's friends, more perceptive than the mass, or desirous of putting the best face on the matter, bestowed hearty applause and congratulations, without, however, deceiving him as to want of success with the bulk of the audience. A writer in the Figaro put the situation wittily and neatly next day:—

"I do not know if France counts a composer the more. The matter is beyond my competence, but the Club des Entrainés possesses another member. It is necessary to explain, is it not, that which one means by the Entrainés. Under this generic name are classed the happy authors who, at the fall of the curtain, yield to the clamours of imprudent friends, and show themselves in company with the interpreters of their work. As their modesty causes them to hang back, on les entraîne." "Les Pêcheurs" gradually faded from the stage, the public continuing indifferent to its unfamiliar charms. It was played through October, alternately with "Le Nozze de Figaro," then appeared at wider intervals, and received its last representation on November 23. The fact is worth noting that, of all the critics who sat in judgment upon "Les Pêcheurs," Berlioz showed the clearest insight into the power of the composer. He said: "The score of this opera has won a real success; it contains a considerable number of beautiful and expressive pieces, full of fire and rich colouring. . . . The work does the greatest honour to M. Bizet, who will have to be accepted as a composer, notwithstanding his rare talent as a pianist." But other writers accused Bizet of all and sundry high crimes and misdemeanours, including Wagnerism, from the charge of which he escaped only when he ceased to live.

With "Les Pêcheurs de Perles" off his hands, Bizet set about composing a grand opera in five acts, on the subject of "Ivan le Terrible," libretto by MM. Blau and Gallet. At this time our composer was infatuated with the later style of Verdi, yielding himself up completely to its fascinations. He became, so to speak, drunk with Verdi, and the music of "Ivan le Terrible" was naturally affected thereby. Some critics suppose that Bizet deliberately strove to engraft the Italian master's style upon that of the French school, and thus obtain an original cross-breed; but it is more reasonable to assume that the young, sensitive, and impulsive Frenchman had no set purpose whatever. We are the more confirmed in this opinion by the fact that when the Verdi fever abated, Bizet, restored to his right mind, withdrew the score of his opera from the Lyrique, where it had been accepted, and some years later destroyed it.

The master next began upon a symphony, "Souvenirs de Rome," into which was incorporated the Scherzo of the orchestral Suite. Soon, however, the unfinished score had to be laid aside in favour of another opera, "La Jolie Fille de Perth," which his friend and constant admirer, Carvalho, commissioned him to write. He varied his work upon this by composing "pot-boilers," such as dance movements for the orchestra, and the six pieces published by Heugel, under the title "Reuilles d'Album." The necessity of keeping the wolf from the door knew no law; but Bizet hated so mean a task. Writing to his friend Galabert, he said:—

"Be assured that it is aggravating to interrupt my cherished work for two days to write solos for the cornet à pistons. One must live. But I have my revenge. . . . The piston utters the yells of a low drinking shop, the ophicleide and the big drum agreeably mark the first beat with the bass trombone, the celli and the double-basses, while the second and third beats are marked by the horns, violas, second violins, the first two trombones, and the side drum. Yes, the side drum. If you could see the viola part! There are unhappy people who pass their lives performing such things. Horrible! . . . I work tremendously, and have just finished, at a gallop, six Melodies for Heugel. I think you will not be dissatisfied with them. I have chosen my words well. . . . I have not suppressed a strophe. It is not for musicians to mutilate poets. My opera, my symphony, all are in train. When shall I finish! Heavens, the time is long, but it amuses me. I have brought myself to adore work. I now go only once a week to Paris. There I limit myself to business and return at a gallop."

MUSICAL CELEBRITIES OF SIENA: AN HISTORICAL SKETCH.

THERE are, even in fair Italy, few places so peculiarly fitted to attract, nay, to inspire, the disciple of the muses as Siena. Its commanding and all but matchless position—rivalled, perhaps, only by that of Perugia; its noble cathedral, its famous Municipal Palace in the fan-shaped Piazza del Campo; the palaces of the grand old Siennese families, whose history is in itself a boundless store of drama and romance; the touching and still revered associations of St. Catherine; the priceless treasures of art and literature; the beautiful Tuscan dialect, spoken in uncontaminated purity by noble and peasant alike—all these combine to stamp Siena as a city pre-eminently sui generis, where, favoured by a high state of civilisation, the Muses early found a home, and have, in the course of centuries, spread their gentle and refining influence, and especially the love of music, through every class of society, through every institution.

The nursery-ground of music in Siena was, and has ever been, the Cathedral. Consecrated as early as 1170, it has for seven centuries, and throughout the ebb and flow of the political fortunes of the city, maintained a standard of excellence to which, in bright contrast to St. Peter's of Rome and other Italian cathedrals, it still, and deservedly, lays claim, as is attested by the beautiful vocal and instrumental performances in the month of August in honour of the Feast of the Assumption of the Virgin, coinciding with the famous annual Mediaeval Games in the Piazza del Campo.

From the Cathedral, the cultivation of music spread to the other churches, notably the Provenzano Church,* built in the sixteenth century, and to the various literary, dramatic, and artistic societies of the town, such as the ancient Accademia dei Rozzi, to which, in the sixteenth century, only those were admitted as qualified members who "could play, sing, compose, or possessed other similar accomplishments." Another powerful means of diffusing the love of music consisted in the musical entertainments or festivals which invariably formed part of the sacred plays and public feasts given in celebration or commemoration of important religious or political events. Indeed, the predilection for festivals of this kind, into which even to this day the Sieneſe enter with all their characteristic gaiety of heart and enthusiasm, dates as far back as the Lodi Juvenali, the ancient Sieneſe feasts in honour of Jove, which, later on, took the name and form of Lodi Giorgiani (St. George being the Sieneſe war-cry in those days), in commemoration of the great victory of the Sieneſe over the Florentines at Montaperto (1260). To these succeeded, in 1360, the sacred performances in honour of St. Ambrosius, which were considered "the most ancient and most beautiful of that kind in Tuscany." Another celebrated annual performance was that of the "Passion Play," which took place on Good Friday, in the Piazza del Campo. In the year 1446 there was a great instrumental festival in honour of St. Catherine; in 1450 another in celebration of the canonisation of St. Bernard. Again, in 1451, a series of performances took place in honour of the marriage of Frederick III. with Leonora of Portugal. In 1459 there was a grand festival on the return from Mantova of Pope Pius II. (Enea Piccolomini, a Sieneſe noble), on which occasion all the available instrumental and vocal forces of the town and district were brought together, and His Holiness was moved to tears by a beautiful solo which a Sieneſe maiden sang on his solemn entry into his native city. Again, in 1535, there were grand performances in honour of the visit of Charles V.; and in 1558 a musical festival was given in honour of St. Cecilia, patroness of one of the local Academies.

It is worthy of note that on all these occasions, vocal performances by juvenile choirs formed a conspicuous part of the programme; indeed, the peculiar freshness and robustness of Sieneſe voices, which also struck Pacini, the distinguished composer of "Sappho," endures to this day, and cannot fail to be noticed by the visitor who listens to the "popular songs" which enliven the summer evenings—that "unwritten music" which is so characteristic a feature of Tuscany.

Besides the Cathedral Choir and Training School, Siena boasts an excellent Orchestra and Music School, both maintained by the Corporation; and, in addition to the careful cultivation of music in the numerous educational and charitable institutions, I may mention that even in the Lunatic Asylum and the Deaf and Dumb Institute—both far-famed establishments of their kind—the tuition of music has been introduced with highly satisfactory results.

With these facts of very general and carefully fostered musical culture before us, it certainly seems strange that, with a few exceptions, so little should hitherto have been known of the artists, composers, and writers on music to whom, in the course of centuries, Siena has given birth; and it is only quite recently that a deserving Sieneſe musician, Signor Morrocchi, now dead, compiled biographical notes which obtained a prize at the Milan Exhibition of 1881, and have now been printed and edited by Comm. L. Banchi,* the Syndic of Siena, a gentleman of great culture and learning, to whose unremitting labours the invaluable State Archives and the great Public Library of Siena chiefly owe their present fame.

On a perusal of this interesting little volume it becomes at once apparent that, in the fifteenth and following centuries, Siena excelled in music quite as much as in other branches of art and science, although the works of many of her composers, almost all of whom were choirmasters and organists of the Cathedral or Provenzano, have hitherto been more or less buried in oblivion, probably for want of publishers at the time, or for want of means to defray the then excessive cost of printing; and hence these compositions, instead of spreading the fame of their authors beyond the gates of Siena, were for the greater part consigned as manuscripts to the Archives and Libraries of the city, where they have been preserved ever since. The list of Sieneſe musicians contains many a name well known in the history of Italian art, philosophy, law and the like, or connected with the political fortunes of the ancient city, such as Piccolomini, Buoninsegni, Chigi, Tolomei, and others. Suffice it, however, to mention only those composers the intrinsic merits of whose works entitle them to a permanent and conspicuous place not only in the local, but in the general history of music from the year 1500 downwards; namely, from the time when the invention of Ottavio Petrucci of Fossombrone—viz., of printing music—marked the commencement of a new era. The following may serve as a rapid biographical sketch in chronological order:—

Francesco Bianciardi. Lived in the middle of the sixteenth century; choirmaster of the Cathedral; celebrated organist; composer of motetts (for two, three, and four voices), which are preserved in the Municipal Library.

Andrea Feliciani. Died in 1597; considered one of the most distinguished Italian musicians of his time; choirmaster of the Cathedral; composer of madrigals for five voices; MSS. in the Municipal Library.

Agostino Agazzari. Born in 1578. After extensive travels, chiefly in Germany, whence he brought the Pandora, an instrument until then unknown in Italy, he settled in his native city as choirmaster of the Cathedral; wrote numerous masses and motetts; MSS. in the Cathedral Library.

Tommaso Pecci. Died in 1606; was of noble descent; distinguished composer of "Responses for Holy Week," madrigals and so-called "Villanelle"; MSS. in the Cathedral Library.

Annibale Gregori. Died in 1633; learned writer on counterpoint; composed madrigals, motetts, and psalms; MSS. in the Municipal Library.

Carlo Lapini. The most distinguished musician Siena produced in the eighteenth century; born in 1724; was organist of Provenzano Church; corresponded with Bach and Padre Martini of Bologna; wrote the Requiem for the funeral of the Empress Maria Teresa; also numerous masses and other unpublished works; MSS. in Provenzano Archives.

Deifebo Romagnoli. Born in 1765; organist of the Cathedral; excellent master; wrote numerous masses, psalms, a capella, and overtures; MSS. in the Municipal Library.

Ettore Romagnoli, brother of the former. Born in 1772; distinguished choirmaster of Provenzano; MSS. of his masses and other compositions preserved in Provenzano Archives.

* Provenzano Salvani was a famous but despotic Ghibelline leader of the thirteenth century, killed in battle near Siena, by the Guelphs, in 1260.

* "La Musica in Siena," by Rinaldo Morrocchi, edited by L. Banchi, 1886.

A sketch, however succinct, of Sienese Musicians would not be complete without the artists who, bred and born and trained in Siena, afterwards attained European celebrity. Of these I need only mention three—Moretti, Bernardi, and Marietta Piccolomini:—

Andrea Moretti. Born about 1550; was a celebrated virtuoso on all pizzicato instruments then in vogue, and especially on the Cetera, a species of large lyre which, after his travels, he brought from Poland and perfected in Bologna by increasing the number of strings from sixteen to twenty. He was a favourite artist at the Court of Ferdinand of Medici, in Florence; and as such took a leading part in the great festival given in that city on the occasion of Ferdinand's marriage with Christina of Lorraine (1589). Indeed, we read that when he played before that beautiful Princess at a villa near Florence he was, as a special honour, allowed to rest his foot against the chair on which she was seated. On his return to his native city he was made pensioner of the Cathedral Orchestra. His favourite instrument, which he taught to many distinguished pupils, won for him the name of Maestrino della Cetera.

Of Francesco Bernardi, born in 1680, and called the "Senesino," it is hardly necessary to speak, for his name is too well known in connection with Handel who, unfortunately for himself, quarrelled with this celebrated tenor, the spoiled favourite of London audiences at that time. In 1739, when in Florence, he sang a duet with the Archduchess, afterwards Empress, Maria Teresa; and here, as everywhere else, his unaffected and beautifully expressive style earned for him laurels without end.

The greatest Sienese artist of our own time is undoubtedly Marietta Piccolomini, of the noble family of Clementini. She was born in 1836, and, after being carefully trained in her native city, made her first appearance in Florence as Lucrezia Borgia. After her brilliant triumphs in Turin, London, New York, and many other capitals, she returned to Italy, and retired from the stage on her marriage to Marchese della Farnia. In 1857 she sang several of her greatest parts in Siena; and such was the enthusiasm of the people from near and far that many of them spent half the day, nay, even had their meals, in front of the theatre in order to secure seats for the opera. This once so famous and versatile artist, whose sympathetic appearance, hardly less than her beautiful voice and style, exercised so peculiar a charm on all who heard her, is now living near Siena, and is frequently in the midst of her townspeople with whom she has ever retained the familiar and endearing name—"La Marietta."*

Such is a rapid sketch of the musicians of whom Siena may justly be proud. It is impossible here to enter into the merits of the many sacred compositions which, accumulated ever since the beginning of the 16th century, adorn the various archives and libraries of the town; nor does space allow me to speak of the highly interesting ancient compositions, psalms, &c., which, dating from the 10th, 11th, and 12th centuries, are preserved in the State archives; nor of the invaluable and beautifully illuminated manuscript collection of ancient French troubadour songs, with musical notation, which dates from the 13th century, and is preserved in the Municipal Library.

Enough, at all events, has been said to show that, as in other branches of art, so also in the early development and subsequent cultivation of music has Siena taken a much larger and more important share than has hitherto been supposed. Native talent, native training, and the constant and invigorating influence of Cathedral services and popular festivals early formed a distinct school of which, as a modern artist, Marietta Piccolomini may be said to be pre-eminently representative. As far as composers, properly speaking, are concerned, that school, no doubt, produced neither a Bach, nor a Beethoven, nor a Cherubini; but it was a school thoroughly characteristic of Siena and the Sienese; in short, it was—as Lanzi says in speaking of Sienese painting and sculpture—"a bright school grown up in the midst of an essentially gay-hearted and festive people." C. P. S.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE HISTORY OF MEDIÆVAL MUSIC.

In the years 1882 and 1884 respectively were published two volumes, entitled "Recueil de Motets français des XII^e et XIII^e siècles, publiés d'après les manuscrits, avec introduction, notes, variantes, et glossaire, par Gaston Raynaud; suivis d'une étude sur la musique au siècle de Saint Louis, par Henry Lavoix fils." The first of these volumes, which form part of the "Bibliothèque française du moyen âge," published under the direction of MM. G. Paris and P. Meyer (Paris, F. Vieweg), contains the French, i.e., by far the larger, portion of the words of the "Chansonnier de Montpellier." The second volume contains, in the lesser first division (183 pages), lyrical poems derived from diverse manuscripts ("Le Chansonnier d'Oxford," "Le manuscrit de la Clayette," &c.); and in the second division M. H. Lavoix fils' study on the music in the century of St. Louis. The "Chansonnier de Montpellier" is the most precious of the known monuments relative to the harmonic music of the Middle Ages. To this manuscript (which must not be confounded with another famous possession of the Montpellier library, the plain-chant manuscript noted both in neumes and letters, which M. Danjou discovered in 1847) attention was first drawn in 1851 by M. Nisard. Fourteen years later M. de Coussemaker described it at length in his "Art harmonique aux XII^e et XIII^e siècles." The literary contents of the "Chansonnier de Montpellier" has mainly a linguistic and historical interest. Lovers of poetry will find in it less satisfaction than philologists and students of manners and customs. Although the frequently occurring terms of musical forms and instruments cannot but incite the curiosity of musicians, the real value of the manuscript lies for them in the music. "It contains," says M. de Coussemaker, "no less than 340 two, three, and four-part compositions anterior to the fourteenth century, and having for their authors discantists (déchanteurs), chapel-masters of Notre-Dame of Paris, the most celebrated teachers of the times, and lastly trouvères. This manuscript, which formerly belonged to the rich collection of President Bouhier [jurisconsult and littérateur, died 1746], belongs now to the library of the Faculté de Médecine de Montpellier, where it bears the indication 'H. 196.' . . . The manuscript is entirely noted in black, square notation, written on staves of four and five red lines, sometimes in two columns, sometimes in long lines. . . . All the compositions of the manuscript are anterior to the last third of the thirteenth century." Thus much for the manuscript of Montpellier and the poetic portion of the above-indicated two volumes. As to M. H. Lavoix fils' study on the century of St. Louis (the thirteenth century), it is not so much a complete musical history of that age as a classified aggregation of notes and hints pour servir à une histoire. The author does not enter into the intricacies of mediæval theories, but refers the reader to the works of De Coussemaker, Fétis, and others. As M. Lavoix wrote his study for the general student of history, and not exclusively for musicians, this incompleteness may be said to have been to a certain extent enforced. Moreover, he wished "to avoid as much as possible repetition of what others had already said in histories of music," and whilst "De Coussemaker a cherché l'explication de la lettre dans le manuscrit, nous chercherons l'esprit artistique de l'œuvre." There can be no doubt that our author has contributed many vivifying touches to the picture of the musical life in the Middle Ages which a laborious band of historians has, during the last six decades, been trying to paint. Henceforth no writer or student who takes the music of that period for his subject can neglect with impunity "La musique au siècle de Saint Louis." It is difficult to say which of the chapters into which the book is divided is the most interesting; I have, however, a specially grateful recollection of the first (Les Ecoles, Les Abbayes, Les Maîtrises, Les Ecoles des Ménestrandie, Les Bibliothèques), fourth (L'Exécution, Le Chant, Les Instruments, Les Musiciens), and fifth (La Critique, Le Symbolisme et la Philosophie de la musique au XIII^e siècle) chapters. In the last chapter (A travers sept siècles) the author endeavours to describe the musical evolution from the thirteenth to the nineteenth century. A table of the musical instruments of the thirteenth century, a list of musicians, singers, composers, theorists, and instrument makers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, an excellent alphabetical index, and a useful bibliography of the thirteenth century greatly facilitate the study of that interesting but dark age. I use the word "dark" in the sense of obscure, and the word suggests the other cause why M. Lavoix's book is, and to a certain extent must be, fragmentary. "En histoire musicale," he remarks, "il n'y a pas de lacunes, il n'y a que des ignorances." True, and these "ignorances" are, in the musical history of the Middle Ages, great and many. The monuments that have come down to us (the curious will find the harmonic compositions of this period enumerated in M. de Coussemaker's "L'Art harmonique aux XII^e et XIII^e siècles") are few and our ability to read them imperfect. And, apart from the monuments—i.e., the musical compositions—most of the available documents are worthless, or nearly so, because of the writers' ignorance of the subject they treat of. Thus, the difficulties the historian of those times encounters are twofold, and they proceed from the scanty quantity and the bad quality of the materials with which he has to deal. The scanty quantity is, however, the chief obstacle; for, if a sufficiency of material were once collected we should not have long to wait before the sifting was done. M. Edmond Vander Straeten (in "La Musique aux Pays-Bas," Vol. I., introduction) asks whether a veritable history of music is possible, and answers the question with an emphatic "no." "Contradictions and darkneses, fables mixed with true narratives, puerile details usurping the place of serious facts, such is, at this moment, the physiognomy of our musical annals." True as this is of musical history in general, it is especially true of mediæval musical history. But I am afraid that if we have to wait till a "veritable history" is written, those who are now living will have to do without a history altogether. In the meantime, it would be desirable, I think, to have, as a makeshift, a critical résumé of the information hitherto obtained, which now lies scattered in many manuscripts, printed volumes, and more fugitive publications. I wish I could regard M. Lavoix's valuable contribution to mediæval musical history as a promise of a more comprehensive and exhaustive work on this subject. Does not the task invite him and fire his ambition? FR. NIECKS.

* About two years ago the Standard, in a leading article, informed the world that Maria Piccolomini was living in poverty and distress. It turned out to be a hoax, and was promptly contradicted by the great artist herself, who since then has, moreover, inherited a considerable fortune from a Piccolomini, a distant cousin.

THE prospectus of "Novello's Oratorio Concerts" for the season 1886-7, to be given at St. James's Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, evidences an amount of enterprise highly creditable both to this artist and the admirable forces under his command, for only one composition contained in last season's programmes (Gounod's "Mors et Vita") is repeated, and the first three Concerts of the series of six, consist of the works written for the Leeds Festival. At the first Concert, on the 29th inst., Dvorák's Oratorio, "Saint Ludmila," will be given, under the direction of the composer, for the first time in London. At the second, November 23, Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Golden Legend," and the third "Messe Solennelle," by Ch. Gounod—the latter for the first time in London. At the third, December 14, A. C. Mackenzie's Dramatic Cantata, "The Story of Sayid"; "The Revenge," ballad for chorus and orchestra, by C. V. Stanford—both for the first time in London; and Liszt's "13th Psalm." At the fourth, February 1, 1887, F. H. Cowen's Cantata "Sleeping Beauty" and Beethoven's Choral Symphony. At the fifth, March 1, Spohr's Oratorio "Calvary" (first time in London since 1852); and at the sixth, March 30, Gounod's Sacred Trilogy "Mors et Vita." The following artists have already accepted engagements: Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. F. King, Mr. Watkin Mills, and Mr. Santley; and it may be mentioned as a feature in the presentation of the Leeds Festival novelties, that the original vocalists will take part in the performance. The choir has undergone the most rigid supervision, and changes have been made where necessary, the rehearsals which have taken place evidencing already the excellent effect of this re-organisation. The orchestra will include the best available instrumentalists, under the leadership of Mr. Carrodus, and Mr. Oliver King will preside at the organ.

THE interest of an article upon Liszt, by his American pupil, Mr. Albert Morris Bagby, which appears in the September number of the Century Magazine, is perhaps increased by the fact of its not having been hastily prepared in consequence of the master's decease; for it was not until the Magazine had gone to press that this melancholy news was announced. So charming a gossiping paper as Mr. Bagby's "A summer with Liszt in Weimar" would have been cordially welcomed at any time; but now that the great artist is no longer amongst us every record of his inner life acquires additional worth, and considering that the article to which we draw attention contains two full-page portraits—one, "Liszt at the piano," most vividly recalling his features at a moment of inspiration—besides a sketch of his home, and portraits of two of his pupils, there can be little doubt that many persons will gladly avail themselves of the opportunity to become possessed of so valuable a souvenir. Mr. Bagby's unassuming and thoroughly natural style of writing is admirably suited for the task he has set himself, of conveying an accurate picture of the man as he lived, with his daily surroundings, the many minute details of his occasional trips with some of his favourite pupils—especially his visit to the Circus, where he was received by the manager "in evening dress, and bareheaded"—and the numerous records of his conversational powers reminding us forcibly, and equally pleasurablely, of Boswell's life-like recollections of Liszt's literary prototype, Dr. Johnson. We shall be glad, indeed, if the few remarks our space will allow us to make upon Mr. Bagby's paper should have the effect of inciting our readers to peruse it in the pages of the Century Magazine, a publication, by the way, which is in every respect deserving of the warmest praise.

WHEN wholesome truths are set forth in legitimate fashion they deserve as wide a circulation as possible. For this reason we have great pleasure in transcribing some admirable remarks on Music in London in the summer months, which appear in the London letter of Wright and Round's Brass Band News (published at Liverpool) of September 1. After pointing out how small after all is the absolute number of those whose absence is taken to constitute the "emptiness" of London, and regretting that entrepreneurs and artists generally should "placidity assume" about the beginning of July that "it is not worth while to cater for the four millions or so of people who remain 'in populous city pent,'" the writer goes on to say: "The people themselves, who desire to be entertained, gladly accept anything in the shape of amusement, and crowd the music-halls nightly, to the delight and astonishment of the proprietors of those delectable places. . . . The performers at these halls, astonished at the abnormal influx of visitors, labour under the impression that it is their own particular talents which form the staple of the attraction, and comfort themselves accordingly. . . . If the music-hall is to be the favoured place of amusement for the derelict millions of the Metropolis during the 'off-season,' it might be a social if not a moral advantage if some trouble were taken to regulate the quality of the programmes provided, and curb the license of the singers. . . . The people must have entertainment, but there is no reason why the form should be gross and vulgar." The success which has attended the "classicalising" of the programmes of the Promenade Concerts is an encouraging sign, according to this writer, of the musical capacity of popular audiences. Without entering into a discussion of this point, we may be allowed to express our regret that he should have thought fit to remark, apropos of Mr. Crowe's new vocal waltz, "so long as it serves its purpose (apparently that of tickling the ears of the public), and secures a good profit to the composer, no one will complain." On the contrary, the "damnable iteration" of tawdry melodies by mechanical and human agencies is one of the direst artistic misfortunes of the age, and is deeply deplored by an ever increasing section of the community.

THE Stewards of the Gloucester Festival met on the last day of the Festival week, and were informed by their Secretary that a levy of about £2 each would be necessary to balance the accounts, the deficiency being estimated at £400, more or less. There were no complaints. On the contrary, the gentlemen present seemed much pleased with the artistic and popular success of the Festival, and anticipated that a continuation of liberal and spirited management would soon make the institution self-supporting. As regards the clerical charity, it should be stated that the qualifying sum paid by each Steward (£5) goes direct to the funds, which have benefited by the Festival to the extent of £1,700. On the suggestion of Mr. Joseph Bennett, the Stewards referred to the Music Committee the question of inviting Sir Arthur Sullivan, Mr. Mackenzie, Mr. Cowen, Mr. Hubert Parry, and Mr. C. L. Williams, to compose works for the Festival of 1886.

THE excellent Dean of Gloucester (Dr. Butler) is bent upon carrying out in practice one of the lessons which, in his Festival sermon, he derived from the text "Comfort ye, my people." Writing to the local papers, he states that "during the next six months a performance of sacred music, conducted by Mr. C. L. Williams, will be given in the nave of the Cathedral, on the evenings of the second and fourth Thursdays in each month." The music will consist partly of singing and partly of playing on the organ. Dr. Butler adds:—"Our object is not so much to advance the cultivation of this great and noble art—for which important end other means are elsewhere provided—as to bring under the notice of those who are least instructed in music, the simplest, most pathetic, and most majestic passages from oratorios, anthems, chorals, and hymns." Well done, Dean of Gloucester! The poor will not only "have the Gospel preached unto them," but the flowers of sacred art brought within reach, to their individual consolation and the furtherance of good musical taste. We would say to all the Deans in the kingdom, "Go ye, and do likewise."

THE GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

THE danger of allowing a musical institution, however it may be sanctified by age, to lapse into a state of tacit defiance of the law of progress has been decisively shown by the increased interest taken in the Three Choir Festivals since additional vigour has been infused into the counsels of the managing Committee. Those who, like ourselves, have ever upheld these musical gatherings, not only on their charitable, but on their artistic claims to public support, have always admitted that, having a distinctive character of their own, the exciting effect of the production of as many new works as may be expected at other festivals would be out of keeping with the time-honoured placidity of meetings which, taking place in a Cathedral, should be regarded rather as appealing to the devotional than the critical feeling of the listeners. Art, however—even sacred art—cannot stand still; and, whilst retaining, therefore, those masterpieces now almost indispensable at all our festivals, not only important new works which have elsewhere received the stamp of approval, but some few especially written for the occasion should be invariably admitted into cathedral programmes, every opportunity being given for secular novelties at the evening concerts in the Shire Hall. It is precisely because these conditions have been amply fulfilled that we regard this as one of the most satisfactory of the Three Choir Festivals, for not only have many standard works been allowed to retain the position which they have long occupied, but recent successes have been thoroughly recognised, and commissions given to well-known writers to supply new compositions for the occasion. Apart from these artistic efforts, too, it must be seen that a more extended sympathy with the Festival has been manifested on all sides, for the opening sermon was preached by the Dean; and, resolved not to be outdone by the other two Cathedral cities, the inhabitants of Gloucester combined to decorate their principal streets with appropriate devices, the names of the composers whose works were performed appearing surrounded by evergreens, and accompanied by quotations from their compositions.

At the opening service, on the first day of the Festival (the 7th ult.), the Mayor and Corporation of Gloucester, with the usual officials, together with the Mayors of Worcester, Hereford, Cheltenham, and Tewkesbury, in their robes of office, attended at the Cathedral, which was crowded in every part. The choral portion of the service was as well rendered by the three choirs as could be expected, considering the impossibility of any united rehearsal. Tallis's Responses were used, the Te Deum and Benedictus were sung to Walmisley in D, and the Anthem was S. S. Wesley's "Blessed be the God." The sermon, preached by the Very Rev. Dr. Butler, Dean of Gloucester, on the text "Comfort ye, comfort ye, My people, saith your God," was one of the most eloquent tributes to the power of music we have ever listened to from the pulpit, and one which cannot fail to produce incalculable good to the Festivals of the future. We regret, indeed, that space will not allow us to quote much which deserves to linger in the memory of all who love and cultivate the art; but the following passage we cannot resist transferring to our pages. After dwelling upon the great advantage of spreading music amongst the masses of our countrymen, the preacher said—"There have been instances not a few of gifts, on a princely scale, for parks, for cottage building, for libraries, and the like—noble gifts by which, as the donors must rejoice to know, the humblest of their countrymen have found happiness and solace. The same bounty on a much narrower scale might do much for music. Many a rich man might, with little effort and great delight to himself, maintain a high-class orchestra for a few thousands a year, and send it constantly through all parts of the country—in villages as well as in towns—playing in the open air as well as in great buildings, so that even the poorest might enjoy. The one condition to be laid down would be that nothing should be played or sung but of genuine worth." Here, indeed, is proof that the true mission of music, not only as an aid to religion, but as an important humanising influence, is fully acknowledged by one whose position and power must add weight to his teachings, and we sincerely hope that his words may sink deeply into the hearts of those whose means enable them to act upon a suggestion fraught with incalculable benefit to the art, and—in the real meaning of the preacher's text—"Comfort to the people."

Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was the first Oratorio performance in the Cathedral, the congregation at the service only quitting the building in time to allow the ticket-holders to enter and take their places. Considering that the principal singers were Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley—subordinate parts being entrusted to Miss May Dickenson, Miss Mary Morgan, Messrs. Woodward, Evans, and Watkin Mills—little need be said of the manner in which the work was rendered throughout. We may mention, however, that although some of the numbers were taken at too slow a pace, the precision with which the choral portions were sung reflected the utmost credit upon the Conductor, Mr. C. Lee Williams.

The first Concert at the Shire Hall, in the evening, commenced with Mr. C. Harford Lloyd's Cantata "Andromeda," written for the Festival and conducted by the composer. The libretto of this work, from the practised hand of Mr. F. E. Weatherly, relates the well known story in easy, if somewhat conventional, verse, the task of the composer, especially in the lyrical portions, being carefully considered throughout. Briefly, the argument may be thus stated. At the opening of the Cantata, Cassiopeia, the Queen of Cepheus, is spinning in her palace, absorbed in love for her child, Andromeda, whom she declares to be more beautiful than all the gods in heaven or sea. The country meanwhile is being destroyed by earthquakes and floods, and by a monster which devours the fairest of the children and of the flocks. The priests, after praying to their deity, Atergati, tell the Queen that these plagues are caused by her guilty idolatry of Andromeda, and that to atone for this she must sacrifice her child, who is taken and chained to a cliff, to be devoured by the monster. Then a voice is heard, and Percus appears, saying that he has been sent to deliver her. He wins her love, at dawn encounters the monster, and after attacking him with his sword uncovers the Gorgon's head, which he carries beneath his mantle, and turns the beast to stone. It will be seen that here is ample material for the exercise of a musician's skill and fancy; how Mr. Lloyd has succeeded we will endeavour to show. In accordance with modern custom, the composer has made use of leading themes, contenting himself—wisely, we think—with introducing them as merely representative phrases in the course of the Cantata, no imitation of Wagner's method of treating them being attempted. The short instrumental Prelude simply announces these in the following order—the "Triumph of Love," the Perseus, or "love-motive," the "Doom," and the "Curse," all of which are sufficiently sympathetic in character with the incidents they are associated with to be easily recognised on their recurrence. The first Scene—"In the Palace"—commences with an Instrumental Prelude in B flat major, leading to a chorus of the Queen's Maidens, "Turn on, my wheel," the monotonous semiquaver triplets which appropriately accompany this being suddenly interrupted by the despairing utterances of the people without. A good effect is here gained by the efforts of the attendants of the Queen to shut out the sounds from her ear—the spinning accompaniment being afterwards resumed, and skilfully combined with the murmuring voices of the people. A solo for the Queen, in E flat, "Ah! was it only yesterday?" begins with a placid melody (somewhat overweighted, however, by the accompaniment), the spinning instrumental figure once more occurring, to the same words, and the conclusion of the number being really pathetic in its simple beauty. The cries of the people outside the palace are now for the first time heard by the Queen, who draws the curtains aside and listens to a chorus of the people, assembled on the terrace, the opening words, "Woe for the terrible day," set to a wailing theme in A minor, being succeeded by pathetic phrases for the various divisions of the choir, and a well-marked passage of imitation, in D minor, the concluding portion of the number containing some impassioned choral writing expressive of the curse which has fallen upon the land. A short Recitative by a Priest, ending on the dominant harmony of F major, leads to a March in that key, accompanying the Queen, priests, and people to the temple of Atergati, the piece being melodious, quietly scored, and sufficiently non-jubilant in character to harmonise with the solemnity of the occasion. The Prayer which opens the second scene—"The Temple"—is a smooth piece of choral writing, in D minor, which shows the skilled hand of one trained in the good and solid school of sacred music, the accompaniments throughout enforcing, and not obscuring, the clearness of the voice parts. After the casting of the lots, and the announcement to the Queen that she is the guilty party, occurs an effective duet, in A minor, between the Queen and a Priest, in which the mother is told that she must expiate her offence by the sacrifice of her daughter. The solo and chorus of Priests following, "Take her hence by night," leads to a placid duet, "Ah me, my child," between the Queen and Andromeda, the melodious responsive phrases in which are deeply sympathetic with the leave-taking of mother and daughter. The third scene—"Night upon the shore"—begins with a chorus, "Slowly over the deep we go," commencing in C major, with a syncopated accompaniment, and modulating into A flat, when the shore is reached and the anchor cast. The binding of Andromeda to the cliff, with the short choral phrases expressive of the driving of the nails, the change into G major, where the victim is abandoned to her fate, and the return to C major for the address to the Queen of the Sea, show much dramatic feeling. Andromeda's Scene, which follows, is undoubtedly one of the best solo pieces in the work, her despairing invocation to the night, the sudden remembrance of the scenes of her happy life, the gradual approach of the daylight, and her final farewell to life, being treated not only with much musical skill, but with an intimate knowledge of the powers both of the voice and orchestra, and a ripened judgment in using them to the best advantage. The chorus of Sea-maidens and Tritons, "Sing we, sing to the starry skies," is in good contrast with the Scene which precedes it, and the frequent changes of key and time are in true keeping with the varied feeling of the words. The solo of Perseus, in A flat, "Maiden of the snow-white brow," has some charming modulations, especially one to E major, where Perseus draws nearer to the captive maiden, and finds by her tears that she is mortal; but the piece, although containing many passages of genuine passion, is somewhat unequal in musical merit. The Scene which follows, carried on chiefly in dialogue between the lovers, derives much of its effect from the vividness of colouring in the instrumentation, the chorus, with soli, "Love, thou victor," concluding the Cantata with good effect, solos for Andromeda and Perseus being combined with the choir, and the number ending with an ensemble, in which, to these voices, those of the Queen and a Priest are added. That Mr. Lloyd has found it difficult to define a style in treating a subject musically which his librettist has evidently found it equally perplexing to treat poetically, can scarcely be doubted even by the sincerest friends of the composer. Certainly human interest is awakened for the poor Queen, who is quietly spinning—unconscious even of the earthquakes which are constantly occurring—when she is interrupted by the cries of her people, and compelled to sacrifice her own daughter because she loves her too much. But when we come to the scene where Sea-maids and Tritons arise from their watery homes, Andromeda sees “a beautiful youth, hovering close beside her, borne upon golden wings,” and a monster is turned to stone by the display of the Gorgon’s head, we are transported at once to the regions of Myth, and seem to feel that the spinning chorus, with the lamentations of the citizens outside the palace gates, must belong to some other story, reflecting modern thought, and appropriately wedded to modern music. Considering the several portions of the work as abstract musical numbers, however, we have unquestionably better writing than Mr. Lloyd has yet given us. The choral music has, indeed, merit of a very high order, amongst the best specimens of which we must mention the “Spinning Chorus,” “Woe for the terrible day,” the solo and chorus, “Take her hence by night,” with the declamation of the Priest in the Dorian mode, and the chorus of the people in the boat, “Slowly over the deep we go.” Andromeda’s Scena, too, many portions of the solo of Perseus (throughout which the “love-motive” plays an important part in the accompaniment), and his duet with Andromeda are entitled to warm praise. Indeed, clearness of design and refinement of style, so obvious in all the works Mr. Lloyd has previously given to the world, are in “Andromeda” more than ever evidenced; and we need scarcely say that a fame thus gradually and carefully built up, if not actually strengthened by his present essay, is one which he may rely upon to secure a welcome for any further compositions from his pen. The execution of the Cantata was everything that could be desired, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills exerting themselves to the utmost to ensure the success of the work; Miss Williams in the Scena, and Mr. Lloyd in the love-song and following duet, especially producing a marked effect. The composer was overwhelmed with applause at the termination of the performance, and recalled to the platform to receive a renewal of the sincere congratulations of the audience.

The second part of the Concert opened with Sterndale Bennett’s Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, the executive power and poetical feeling of Miss Fanny Davies, who played the pianoforte part, eliciting enthusiastic marks of approbation, and fully justifying the Directors in restoring pianoforte music to a place in Festival programmes from which for so many years it has been unaccountably banished. Every praise must be awarded to Mr. Carrodus for his performance of the Andante and Rondo from Molique’s fifth Violin Concerto, to Mr. E. Lloyd for his excellent rendering of Schubert’s “Regret” and Serenade (accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. C. H. Lloyd), and to Mr. Watkin Mills for his singing of Verdi’s “O tu, Palermo”; but more than conventional words of commendation are due to Miss Ellicott (daughter of the Bishop of Gloucester), whose “Dramatic” Overture, although last in the programme, ensured attention by its exceptional merit, as the composition of one who must still be regarded as a student. Essentially modern in construction, and fully—indeed, in parts, even heavily—scored, the work is clear in form, the themes well defined, and the term “dramatic” fairly justified. At the conclusion Miss Ellicott was led forward and deservedly applauded.

Dvorák’s “Stabat Mater” formed the first part of the Cathedral programme on Wednesday morning. This fine work, which at once made the fame of its composer in England, although well-known to musicians, was very probably new to many who listened to it on this occasion, happily for them in a building the surroundings of which deepened that devotional feeling called forth by the sublime music of the Bohemian master. Unfortunately, however, the intonation of the choir was at times faulty; and, in spite of Mr. Williams’s excellent conducting, the choruses, therefore, scarcely made the impression they should have done. The principal singers were, however, of such eminence as to secure a perfect rendering of all the solo portions of the work, a record of their names—Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley—amply justifying this assertion. Mendelssohn’s “Reformation Symphony,” a composition but too seldom heard, commenced the second part, and this was followed by Gibbons’s anthem, “Almighty and everlasting God,” S. Wesley’s “Exultate Deo,” and Hiller’s “Song of Victory.” Both the anthems were sung without accompaniment, and produced a marked effect upon a most attentive audience, the “Song of Victory,” however, losing somewhat by contrast with the preceding pieces. It was well sung, Miss Williams’s solo parts being given with vigour and precision.

In the evening, at the Cathedral, Mr. W. S. Rockstro’s Oratorio “The Good Shepherd,” composed for the Festival, occupied the first part of the programme. Before pronouncing judgment upon a work which, whatever may be its value, is entitled to respectful consideration, as the composition of one already known in the art, let us see how Mr. Rockstro has treated his theme. In the first place, it must be said that the Oratorio is divided into two parts, “The Sheep without a Shepherd,” and “The Shepherd and the Sheep”; in the former the faithful being represented as sheep scattered upon the hills, and in the latter as being under the loving care and guidance of the Shepherd. It may be at once said that the composer has adopted the system of introducing characteristic themes, a method which seems growing as much in sacred as in secular works. Criticism upon this modern innovation has been so voluminous that we will not here renew the discussion, the question now being rather whether it has been well done than whether it should be done at all. The six themes are as follows:—the “Trumpet Call,” with which the Overture commences, recurring in the work as a Proclamation before the annunciation of a Prophecy; a simple phrase, with syncopated rhythm, typical of divine “Invitation”; a theme representing the “Good Shepherd”; a figure (scarcely a theme) indicative of “the Sheep”; a pastoral subject representing “the Fold”; and a marked theme treated in varied forms, first appearing where the people deplore the wickedness around them. The Overture introducing the first, fifth, and second of these themes is in tolerably regular form. The vocal portion of the Oratorio begins with a tenor recitative, which is afterwards joined by the other voices, and followed by a chorus. A melodious air for contralto, “Deal bountifully with Thy servant,” preceded by a recitative for the same voice, then occurs, the chorus eventually joining the solo voice. For the next number the instruments are silent, a tenor recitative being accompanied by the three other voices, a novel and certainly interesting feature. The chorus which follows, commencing Presto agitato in F minor, and containing, amongst other notable points, a tranquil phrase in D flat, repeated in F, with voices alone, is an effective number. This is succeeded by a harp solo, which is carried on as an accompaniment to a duet for soprano and tenor, the chorus being again employed as in the contralto solo already named. The first part of the Oratorio ends with an elaborate chorus, “Why boastest thou?” commencing with a choral, accompanied by wind instruments and organ, the subject of the following fugue growing from the choral. Part II. begins with an instrumental introduction, the principal theme in which is that already mentioned as indicating “the Sheep.” A tenor solo, “Complaint,” is followed by an air for soprano, “Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel,” in the accompaniment of which a bass clarinet plays an important part. The “Proclamation theme” then announces an impressive bass recitative, succeeded by an air for the same voice, “Hear the word of the Lord.” The soprano solo, with semi-chorus, “Fear not, little flock,” the choral portion representing the distant voices of angels, has an appropriate accompaniment for the harp throughout. The choral, to some non-scriptural words, “Before Thy throne we bend the knee,” is unaccompanied, the instruments only being employed when the voices cease. The instrumental Ritornel “Peace in the fold,” based on one of the characteristic themes, and preceded by another “Proclamation” for bass, is followed by a recitative and air for tenor, the song “My sheep wandered,” being accompian) by an obbligato for corno Inglese, and sung in the character of the "Good Shepherd," the theme having been already heard in the Overture. An unaccompanied Quartet, "Come unto Me all ye that labour," is followed by another number for the four solo voices, accompanied with sweeping arpeggios for the harp. The last chorus contains another fugue, and terminates the work with broad passages for choir and orchestra. We regret that we cannot supplement our analysis of this work by unqualified praise of the artistic merit displayed in its treatment. Indeed we can only conscientiously affirm that, although the composer shows undoubted power in many of his choruses, and much melodic feeling in several of the solo parts, he can but be credited with good intentions. With the exception of what we certainly must term faulty answers to the subjects of his fugues, we cannot say that he ever offends, but platitudes musically uttered by full choir and orchestra are no better than those uttered by a single speaking voice, and when we say, therefore, that Mr. Rockstro has said nothing to us which has not been said before, we have a right to question why he is permitted to arrest our attention when greater men are waiting for a hearing. The composer, who conducted, could find no fault with the manner in which his work was rendered, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Winch, and Mr. Watkin Mills doing all that could be done with the solos, and the choir singing throughout with commendable steadiness and precision. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," which followed, received an excellent rendering from the orchestra and choir. The soprano solos were finely sung by Miss Anna Williams, but Mr. Winch, who gave the important tenor part, was obviously too much out of voice to do himself justice. A good word, however, must be given to Miss Mary Morgan, whose voice and style were displayed to great advantage in the duet with Miss Williams, "I waited for the Lord."

Gounod's "Mors et Vita" attracted an enormous number of persons to the Cathedral on Thursday morning, the immense popularity of the work in the brief period which has elapsed since its production at Birmingham, in addition to this being the first time of its performance in a Cathedral, making this really one of the most important mornings of the Festival. In every respect the work received a rendering which could not fail to produce a profound impression upon the vast body of listeners; the choruses were given not only with admirable precision, but with a devotional feeling which thoroughly realised the intention of the composer; the solos, by Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, were sung as only these artists can sing them; and the orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Carodus, was—as indeed it had been throughout the Festival—absolutely perfect. In the absence of any audible recognition of the exceptional beauties of the work, we are glad to record that it was listened to with that true reverential spirit which is, after all, the sincerest tribute to the genius of the composer.

The Shire Hall, at the evening Concert, was crowded in every part. Cowen's Cantata, "Sleeping Beauty," formed the first part of the programme; and, conducted by the composer, went extremely well, considering the few opportunities afforded for rehearsal. The solos were given to perfection by Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills, and the orchestra was again highly efficient. The work was received with enthusiasm, and Mr. Cowen applauded with an energy which proved that the verdict pronounced upon the Cantata at Birmingham was fully endorsed at Gloucester. Dr. C. Hubert Parry's new orchestral work, "Suite Moderne," composed for the Festival, commenced the second part of the Concert, and achieved a decided success. It is a pleasure to record that this success was thoroughly deserved; for although decidedly modern in feeling, the writing throughout is as clear as if the composer had never suffered from that "advanced" fever which has prevented so many from giving a healthy and natural expression to the musical ideas within them. There was some confusion in the names of the movements as they appeared in the printed programme, and many were wondering why a quiet and melodious piece should have been termed a "Scherzo"; but we are now enabled to say that the Suite contains a "Ballade," "Idyll," "Romanza," and "Rhapsody." Perhaps we may be inclined to indicate a preference for the first and third movements; but all are good and attractive both to musical and non-musical listeners. The subjects are charming, and the instrumentation shows the hand of a master throughout. The composer, who conducted his work, received quite an ovation at the conclusion of the performance, a decisive indication that he has now developed a style which he may safely pursue with benefit both to himself and the art. After this piece Madame Albani gave a fine rendering of Mozart's "Non temer amato ben" (violin obbligato, Mr. Carodus), and, being encored, sang "Home, Sweet Home," the Concert terminating with Mendelssohn's "Wedding March."

Handel's "Messiah" concluded the Cathedral performances on Friday morning, the principal singers being Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Winch, Mr. Watkin Mills, and Mr. Santley. Again the choir, in spite of the week's hard work, gave the whole of the choruses with undiminished spirit, and Mr. C. L. Williams, as Conductor, strengthened the favourable impression he has so legitimately earned throughout the Festival.

The free evening service in the Cathedral was very fully attended. When the clergy had taken their seats the orchestra played Spohr's second Overture in the "Last Judgment." The responses were again those of Tallis. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were composed for the occasion by Mr. C. L. Williams, both being written in the undying style of the best church composers, and in true sympathy with the sacred text. In Handel's sixth Chandos Anthem the bass solo was well sung by Mr. Watkin Mills, the service concluding with Beethoven's "Hallelujah" Chorus, from the "Mount of Olives," which was given with impressive effect.

We have already borne testimony to the admirable conductorship of Mr. C. L. Williams, and have now only to acknowledge the good service rendered by Dr. Langdon Colborne at the organ, in the morning Cathedral performances, by Mr. Done in the Cathedral, on Wednesday evening, and by Mr. C. H. Lloyd in the pianoforte accompaniments at the Secular Concert on Tuesday evening. The issue of cheap tickets has materially widened the feeling in favour of these Meetings; and we are glad to record that the number of persons attending the performances shows an increase over the last Gloucester Festival of more than 3,000. The collections amount to £532 12s. 2d. (£32 more than in 1883) which, with the contributions of the Stewards, make a total of £1,507 2s. 3d. It will be thus seen that the present Festival, both artistically and financially, has been a most gratifying success.

WOLVERHAMPTON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

WOLVERHAMPTON celebrated its seventh triennial Musical Festival on the 16th and 17th ult., and obtained a measure of success, pecuniary and artistic, such as must have afforded encouragement to those who have undertaken an uphill task. It is one thing to manage an old-established institution which has reached its fullest development, and is grounded in public favour, but quite another to take the reins of a young enterprise, dwarfed by comparison with others of longer standing, and able to accomplish only small things. I cannot help admiring the plucky way in which Wolverhampton perseveres with its little Festival, and I sincerely trust that the result may be expansion in the future, till that which is little becomes great. The arrangements for last month's celebration were on the scale of those made in 1883—the first year in which the proceedings covered two days. As then, Dr. Heap, of Birmingham, acted as Conductor, having under him an orchestra of sixty performers, led by Mr. Carodus, but chiefly gathered from local sources. The chorus was again wholly made up of Wolverhampton amateurs, and the principal vocalists were Madame Valleria, Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Trebelli, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Piercy, Mr. Watkin Mills, Mr. R. Grice, and Mr. Santley. I am not going to say that this equipment, taken as a whole, satisfied Festival needs. Both orchestra and chorus fell short of the special standard applicable to such occasions. But nobody expects an infant to run before it can walk. The Wolverhampton people do the best they can with their means, and, so long as they make progress, we should all be prepared, not with unfavourable and unfair comparisons, but with cheery words of encouragement.

The proceedings began in the Agricultural Hall on the morning of Thursday, the 16th, when Handel's "Messiah" was performed. With reference to this effort, I am of opinion that circumstances did not warrant much leniency of criticism. No doubt the new works in the programme had well nigh monopolised attention at rehearsal; but there is no excuse for a slovenly "Messiah," and this was very slovenly indeed. It is not worth while to dwell upon the matter. Let it pass now with a caution, and a hope of better things next time. The soprano airs in the first part were taken by Mrs. Hutchinson, upon whom severe remarks have been made for unusual defects. Undoubtedly the artist fell much below her average mark, but this was owing to illness of which no public announcement appeared. The Stewards ought to have known better than keep silence under conditions which led critics to be unjust without intending it, and might have done the singer irreparable mischief. But why, under such circumstances, do not artists protect themselves, and insist upon a plea for indulgence? The other vocalists were Madame Valleria, who acquitted herself admirably, Miss Wilson, who was also beyond reproach, Mr. Piercy, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Piercy made a very favourable impression. He is progressing, and, with ordinary care, will work his way into extensive public favour.

At the Concert of Thursday evening was produced a new Cantata, "The Maid of Astolat," libretto by Mr. Desmond L. Ryan, music by Dr. Swinnerton Heap. In dealing with the story of Elaine, Mr. Ryan exercised his right to depart from precedent. He tells us "the librettist has neither sought to preserve the legend in its pristine shape, nor to follow it out in the manner adopted by Lord Tennyson in his admirable 'Idylls of the King.' It has simply been his purpose to compile a book full of opportunities for varied musical treatment." The result is that we have a fanciful story, following mainly the familiar lines, but also embodying a suggestion of Wagner's "Nibelungen" in the form of fateful gems torn from the keeping of river spirits, to whom they are eventually restored. In laying out the story for musical purposes, and also in telling it, Mr. Ryan has shown considerable judgment and skill. The libretto undoubtedly gave the composer good opportunities; the structure and rhythm of the verses are sufficiently varied, and often they attain to genuinely poetic expression. With these merits must be noted one conspicuous fault: the libretto is of too great length for a Cantata, the scenes being unduly spun out, not in action, but in words. This appears to have embarrassed the composer, and is one reason why the work drags. Mr. Ryan will, no doubt, avoid the mistake on another occasion, seeing that, once a situation or expression of feeling has been determined on, the fewer the words employed the better. It is for the musician to give the picture its dimensions, outline, and colouring. The poet furnishes the motive only. With regard to Dr. Heap's music, the space at my command does not permit a lengthy examination, nor, in some respects, does the subject warrant it. A few general remarks must suffice till the work comes up, as it may, for more leisurely examination. That Dr. Heap has here written with much thought and care is no less obvious than that he brought to his task a considerable measure of technical skill and good taste. Regarding the Cantata as an example of manufactured music, I am bound to treat it with respect, the more because the composer, though he uses the fashionable Leitmotif, has not allowed himself to wander in the wilderness of licentious ideas and practices where many a good man has come to grief. Dr. Heap was brought up in an excellent school, and now does not repudiate its teachings. He expresses himself with clearness and frankness; his method is that which served for the latest masters of classic art, and he never plunges into obscurity in order to conceal weakness. Moreover, there are examples in the Cantata of happy fancy and effective utterance. Such is Lancelot's air, "Why beats with rapturous thrill this heart"—a presentation of Dr. Heap at his best, and the best is very good. But, taking a comprehensive view of the work, I am bound to express a doubt whether it serves more than a limited and personal purpose. It cannot be said that music is the richer for it, and in that case, as far as music is concerned, it may just as well never have been written. The time has come to discourage the composition, or, at any rate, the production of merely respectable works, which are nothing more than witnesses to musicianship. Such things are multiplying vastly, in response to an indiscriminating demand for novelties, and are diverting executive resources and public attention from matters much more profitable. I do not apply these remarks to Dr. Heap's Cantata in a special degree, but there is no getting away from the fact that the composer has little to say that has not been said before, that he lacks inspiration and originality, and that—fatal fault—his art is unable to sustain interest through a long work. The performance, conducted by the composer in person, enjoyed every advantage that circumstances permitted. The solos were taken by Mrs. Hutchinson (Elaine), Madame Trebelli (Guinevere), Mr. Lloyd (Lancelot), Mr. Grice (Sir Bernard), and Mr. Watkin Mills (Arthur). With these artists there was lack neither of skill nor good will. As for the band and chorus, it will be assumed that they were enthusiastic on behalf of a Conductor whom they justly esteem. A few miscellaneous selections brought the Concert to an end.

The second day of the Festival opened with a Concert in which three classic works were performed, namely, Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion." There is, of course, nothing that need be said about these masterpieces, and their rendering may be briefly summarised. The solos in the "Stabat" were taken by Mrs. Hutchinson, who was her old self again, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills; each doing justice to a sublime text, while, considering the difficulties of the music, it is possible to applaud the band and chorus for a plucky and fairly successful effort. The work they did sufficed, anyhow, to make a deep impression, which is proof that the music was not inadequately interpreted. In the "C minor" the orchestra played its very best, while the "Lauda Sion" came nearest of all to a satisfactory hearing. The soloists in Mendelssohn's piece, were again those mentioned above. Dr. Heap conducted throughout, and this is, perhaps, the moment to acknowledge the energy and success with which he presided over the general musical doings.

The final Concert took place on Friday evening, when another novelty was produced—a Cantata, "The Bridal of Triermain," by Mr. Frederic Corder. Very much by Mr. Frederic Corder was this work, as given at Wolverhampton, for not only did the composer of the music adapt the words from Walter Scott, but wrote an analysis for the programme-book and conducted the performance. He was the Atlas of the occasion; the whole world of the Cantata resting on his shoulders. Comprehensiveness of this sort runs a risk in proportion to its extent, but Mr. Corder did not over-estimate his powers. In all four capacities he acquitted himself well. "The Bridal of Triermain" will assuredly be heard in London on no distant day, and when it forms his sole text the critic may hope to discuss it without restriction. Here I can only deal in generalities, which, however, will suffice to excite curiosity and interest in anticipation of closer acquaintance. Mr. Corder has wisely respected the poem whence he took his subject and his words. That is to say, there are no material alterations in the text, and the "argument" is as closely followed as the necessity of much abridgment allowed. The main incidents of the poem are, of course, in the Cantata. Hence we have Sir Roland's dream, and the bard Lyulph's explanatory story in the first part, the second being taken up with the Knights's successful attempt to free Gyneth from the spell of Merlin's enchantment. The whole, we need scarcely say, is given in narrative form—not the best form by any means, but the composer has contrived to minimise this difficulty, and secure far more dramatic force and interest than, under such conditions, it was reasonable to expect. Let me confess that the musical handling of the subject came as a pleasant surprise. Mr. Corder is accounted a Wagnerian of the reddest hue—if the violent colour be that of the sect—and it was anticipated, not unnaturally, that his Cantata would illustrate the teachings of "the master" in a special degree. It turns out that our clever countryman loves the "advanced" school with no more than a platonic affection; stopping short of that intimate union which bears fruit. But, be this as it may, apart from the free use of representative themes, the music in the "Bridal of Triermain" might have been written by one to whom modern licentiousness in art is the abomination of desolation. Mr. Corder, it is true, permits himself certain experiments in orchestration and harmony, which bespeak a measure of independence approaching hardihood. But a composer is not to be censured for this. The spirit is praiseworthy, though the outcome may fail of acceptance. I, for one, cannot approve all Mr. Corder's ventures. Some of his progressions are more curious than beautiful, and without harshness it may be said that at least one of his experiments in orchestration is puerile. But these are details of small importance, when the Cantata is comprehensively viewed and its general merit estimated—

Great tamer of all human art!

First in my care, and ever at my heart;
Dulness! whose good old cause I yet defend,
With whom my muse began, with whom shall end.

Mr. Corder, I take it, will never have a right to the words placed by Pope in the mouth of that eminent translator, Dr. Philemon Holland. His Cantata is never dull. I can answer for that, since a critic of experience becomes as sensitive to dulness as the palate of a tea-taster to the "bouquet" of the Chinese herb. He "smelleth it afar off," as Job's war-horse the battle, and detects its fatal presence when others are blissfully unconscious. Then he knows that all is over. Everything may be forgiven in a work except dulness, for what is it but the negation of vitality? The dull thing must die—a providential and never to be sufficiently lauded arrangement. Happily for Mr. Corder, there is no suspicion of dry rot about his Cantata. We may not approve all its features, but we are bound to listen and keep wide awake to the end, such is the vigour of the music, its directness of expression, and its picturesque character. Even when the composer is obviously "agonising" rather than pouring out "profuse strains of unpremeditated art," we are more conscious of effect than of means. He achieves the right thing in the end. It would be easy to prove this by many examples, and to show, likewise, that Mr. Corder has the power both of dramatic feeling and dramatic expression. Look at the second part for evidence, and observe the simple, yet suggestive way in which the Knights' release of Gyneth is illustrated. The man who can do this should also be able to write an opera that will live. In time, no doubt, certain crudities in Mr. Corder's style will disappear, as being the result of an adventurous spirit which years will tame. These got rid of, or at least abated, amateurs will look for thoroughly good work from their countryman, and regard with entire complacency even his most pronounced flirtations with the "advanced" muse.

The performance had good points and bad ones. Mdme. Valleria sang the soprano airs very finely. She was in capital voice, and entered, with her usual thoroughness, into the business of her part. This artist is always sensitive to a composer's intentions, and the meaning of her text; hence there was literally nothing to desire. Miss Hilda Wilson also did well, obtaining an encore for "In lofty hall"; while in Mr. Piercy and Mr. Santley, the tenor and baritone airs had eloquent interpreters. Not much fault could be found with the chorus, but the orchestra fell far short of perfection, and seriously impaired the performance. I have only to add that the Cantata was received with enthusiasm.

A short miscellaneous selection followed, including Purcell's "Let the dreadful engines" (Mr. Santley); Molique's Fandango (Mr. Carrodus); Goring Thomas's "As when the snowdrift" (Madame Valleria); and a few other pieces.

The Festival was well attended throughout, and resulted in the handing over to the medical charities of an acceptable sum.

NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD OF WALES.

ONE of the Triads asserts that the "nation of the Kymry" possess three things, the best of their kind in the world, bardism, law, and music. What was true when this ancient assertion was made largely holds good at the present time.

After the lapse of centuries, the bardism and the love of music are found to survive in the Principality with many of their old characteristics. This was demonstrated at Carnarvon, where, on the 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th ult., this year's Eisteddfod meetings were held. The bards were in full force, with the venerable Archdruid, and the competitions were engaged in with the usual zest.

The "Gorsedd" is a great bardic feature of the Eisteddfod. It was opened at Carnarvon, on the 14th ult., by Clwyfardd, the Archdruid, who, surrounded by bards, took up his position on the logan stone in the inner circle. The competitive meetings in the pavilion were commenced soon afterwards, under the presidency of Mr. Bowen Rowlands, Q.C., M.P., who observed that the Eisteddfod had outlived much abuse and survived a great wealth of sarcasm, which those who did not understand it had thought proper to bestow upon it. "As his old friend, Gwilym Hiraethog, had once said with much of his wonted wit, 'Even the Times, which, like Balaam, ranged the hills to curse, had been forced to stay and bless.'"

The Eisteddfod song ("Wave the banner") was sung by Mr. Lucas Williams. In the course of subsequent proceedings, Miss Parry, Carnarvon, was awarded by Mr. D. Jenkins, M.B., the prize of £3, offered for the best contralto singing, and the successful vocalist was "invested" by Madame Patey, whose appearance on the platform with Mr. Patey had previously been much applauded. In giving his adjudication on the Cantata competition, for a prize of £20 and a gold medal, Mr. John Thomas (Queen's harpist) said four had competed. The prize would go to Miss Edith Peel, Wrexham. The libretto, he said, was written by Llew Llwyfo (the Conductor for the day), and did honour to Wales. For the chief choral prize of £200 and a bâton, value £5, for the conductor, three choirs of about 130 voices, from Sheffield, Birkenhead, and Wrexham, sang the following test pieces:—"Lord, our Redeemer" (Bach's "Passion"); "See what love hath the Father" (Mendelssohn's "St. Paul"); "Ardder chawgrwydd pob gogoniant" (Welsh or English words); and "Amen" from Stephen's "Storm of Tiberias." The adjudicators were Mr. Ebenezer Prout, Mr. John Thomas, Mr. J. H. Roberts, and Mr. D. Jenkins. Amid great excitement, temporarily stilled, Mr. Prout gave the award. He said the adjudicators were well pleased with the singing. In every case there had been a good attack, but the choirs had all lacked slightly in point of time. Then there was, in the case of the Sheffield Choir, a little overshadowing; that was gilding refined gold and painting the lily. But apart from these defects, the choral singing was good. The best choir was Wrexham (Rev. C. Hylton Stewart, Precentor of Chester Cathedral, Conductor), and the second in order of merit was the Birkenhead Choir, (Mr. D. O. Parry). A Concert, taken part in by Welsh artists, was held in the evening, under the presidency of Mr. Swetenham, M.P. On the same evening, it may be also noted, the Lord Mayor of London (Alderman Staples), arrived at Carnarvon, and was entertained at a banquet given by the Mayor of Carnarvon.

On the following day at the Gorsedd his lordship and Mr. Swetenham were ordained Druids. Mr. Henry Richard, M.P., presided at the competitive meeting, and the Rev. W. Thomas (Vicar of St. Asaph) was Conductor. A prize of £10 offered by Lord Aberdare, and a silver medal added by the Eisteddfod Committee, for the best English Essay on "The Characteristics of Welsh poetry, with English illustrations of Metre and Cynganedd," were awarded to the Rev. T. Evans, Merionethshire. Mr. Meyer, an adjudicator upon art painting, incidentally announced, amid great applause, that Mr. David Walsh, Melbourne, would give a prize of £100 for the best painting at the London Eisteddfod next year. A boy named William Benson, of Wigan, took a prize of three guineas offered for the best execution on the violin of Ernst's "Elegy." Three competitors. Welsh Anthem competition. Prize £7 and a silver medal. Mr. J. H. Roberts, in dealing with the works of eleven competitors, said they all exhibited ability, but the winner was "Theophilus" (Mr. James Conway Brown, Farnham, Surrey). His composition was one of the finest which had been sent to any Eisteddfod during the last twenty-five years, and the prize was quite inadequate for such a magnificent production. In an interval, Madame Patey was introduced to the audience by one of the bards, and sang Giordani's "Caro nia ben," and being encored gave another Italian song. Harmonium competition. Prize three guineas. Winner, Mr. G. W. Jones, Penryn. Pennillion singing. Prize £2. Eos y Berth was successful. The Lord Mayor of London was introduced to the meeting by the president, and made a speech appropriate to the occasion, after which a young lady, attired in Welsh costume, handed him a piece of Welsh tweed, which he duly accepted. Three choirs of between forty and sixty voices each—Festiniog, Glantawe (Swansea), and Cynon (Aberdare)—competed for a prize of £25 and a silver medal. The test pieces were "Oh, with me" (Seyfried), and "The Blacksmith" (D. Jenkins). The adjudicators, Mr. D. Jenkins, Mr. E. Prout, Mr. J. Thomas, and Mr. J. H. Roberts, awarded the honours to Glantawe choir (Mr. J. Jones, leader), the Cynon choir receiving special mention. The Bangor Choral Union, under the Conductorship of Dr. Roland Rogers, gave an excellent performance of "Elijah" in the evening, when Mr. T. E. Ellis, M.P., presided. The leading vocalists were Madame Patey, Eos Morlais, and Mr. James Sauvage.

On the Thursday a little incident occurred at the Gorsedd which may be mentioned. Mr. Prout was invested, and Mr. J. Thomas, who acted as his sponsor, said he was proud of the privilege. A voice cried "Dim Saesna yn yr Gorsedd" ("No English at the Gorsedd"), the fact of Mr. Prout's inability to understand Welsh having been evidently forgotten by the speaker. Mr. J. Thomas, however, accepted the rebuke, and reverted to the language of his ancestors. Mr. J. H. Puleston, M.P., presided over the meeting in the Pavilion, and observed in the course of his remarks that he would willingly co-operate financially with others to offer a prize of £100 upon "Emigration" at a coming Eisteddfod. The subject was of importance to the Welsh, and it would be of service to them to have statistics collated on the matter which would be exempt from the touch of emigration officials. Eos Morlais sang the Eisteddfod song, "The land of the harp." Mr. Griffith Jones, the only competitor, received a prize of £15, given by Mr. Pugh Jones, for the best Welsh essay on "The life and services of the late three musicians—Owain Alaw, Tany-marian, and Brinley Richards." Miss A. J. Williams, Beaumaris, one of ten competitors, took the prize of £3 for the best solo, recitative, or aria. Pedal harp competition, "March of the Men of Harlech," Mr. J. Thomas's arrangement. Mr. J. Thomas adjudicated. The prizewinner was Master Thomas Thomas, Builth. The president and the adjudicator gave a guinea each to the two other competitors. Soprano solo competition, "When this scene of trouble closes" (Spohr's "Calvary"). Prize of £3 given by Mr. L. Griffith, Carnarvon, was taken by Llinos y Rhondda. For the best musical composition "In Memoriam" of Lord Penrhyn, a prize of ten guineas was taken by Thomas Price, Merthyr. Five compositions had been sent in. Violin competition, Sonata, Op. 46, No. 1 (Dussek), for children under nine years of age. Prize two guineas. Henry Purcell Jones, Ruabon, was the only competitor. He received the prize, and an occupant of the gallery threw an additional sovereign to him. Signor Foli sang "Jack's Yarn," and, in response to the encore, "Father O'Flynn." Choral competition; choirs of not less than sixty voices. First prize, £40 and a silver medal; second, twelve guineas (given by Mrs. R. Reynard, Harrogate). Two choirs competed: Bagillt Choral Union, Flintshire and Oswestry Philharmonic Society the Oswestry choir being considered the best. The Choir prize of £20 was awarded to Tyfalog. The subject of the ode was "Hope." Mr. Kenyon, M.P., presided at the evening Concert.

On the fourth day, he observed, the Gorsedd authority was declared by the Archdruid to be adjourned to Cafludd (London). The meeting of the Cymrodorion section was presided over by Mr. John Thomas. Dr. Rogers, referring to choral training in Wales, said not one out of ten sopranos could read music from either the tonic sol-fa or old notation. But the day schools and juvenile choral classes were now modifying this condition of things. Baritone tenors should be relegated to the basses, and the gold medal or bâton, which at Eisteddfodic contests was usually given to the conductor of the successful choir, should be given to the conductor who appeared most graceful in his demeanour. Time should also be economised in these contests, and the exact period when a choir was to compete fixed. These suggestions were approved by the meeting, and it is to be hoped that they will be attended to, especially in reference to the time at which competing choirs are to take up their positions. In the Pavilion Buildings songs were rendered by Signor Foli, Eos Morlais, and Miss Mary Davies. The president was Mr. S. Smith, M.P., who ventured the opinion that the "Saxon" as compared with the "Celt" lacked imagination, and he was afraid no civilised country would again produce poetry like that of the "Faery Queen" or "Paradise Lost," except Wales came to the rescue—a sentiment that was not unnaturally received with applause. The pianoforte competition, engaged in by children under fourteen years of age, resulted in a victory for Miss Margaret Mary Jones, Carnarvon (£2), and the President handed a sovereign to another competitor, Miss Millie Richards, Birkenhead, in recognition of the ability she displayed. The prize of £5 offered for the best glee was withheld, as the three compositions were, in the opinion of Mr. John Thomas, below the standard. Bass solo, "Behold the day of the Lord." Thirteen competitors, reduced to four. Mr. Bennett Williams, Portmadoc, won the prize of £3, and Signor Foli presented an unsuccessful singer, J. Williams, Mountain Ash, with a sovereign. Pennillion singing, J. Owen, the only competitor, took the prize of 30s. Rev. Cadfan Davies, Anglesea, was awarded a prize of £20 and a silver crown for the best heroic poem on "Constantine the Great." Band contest: test piece, a selection from "Rigoletto." Prize £20 and gold medal. A Carnarvon band was awarded the prize; Irwell and Festiniog bands being regarded as second and third. The Carnarvon Choral Society gave a rendering of the "Creation" in the evening, Sir Llewellyn Turner presiding, and this brought the four days' Eisteddfodic programme to a close.

The National Eisteddfod Association has prepared an extensive prize list for the London meetings next year. About £3,000 will be offered in various departments. "Wales under Queen Victoria" is the subject of an essay for £50. The chief choral competition will include the rendering of (a) "I wrestle and pray" (Bach), (b) "Wretched Lovers" (Handel), and (c) "Come with torches" (Mendelssohn), for a first prize of £200, and a gold medal for the conductor; and a second prize of £50. In a second competition a prize of £100 will be awarded, competing choirs to be Welsh only. In several towns in Wales ardent preparations are already being made in view of the London choral contests. The adjudicators will probably include Sir Arthur Sullivan, Mr. Walter Macfarren, Mr. Randegger, Mr. John Thomas (Queen's harpist), Dr. Parry, Mr. Jenkins, Mr. G. D. Emlin, and Mr. J. H. Roberts. The net profits of the Carnarvon Eisteddfod are likely to amount, it is said, to about £200.

"RING DES NIBELUNGEN" AT MUNICH.

DURING the month of August last the days were hot, the nights sultry: announcements at the Munich railway station spoke to the weary traveller of tempting lakes in the neighbourhood, and of snowy mountains not very far away. Would the opera house under these circumstances prove an attraction? Would large crowds assemble at the ticket office eager to obtain tickets? Would some have to go empty away? Yes; that was the state of things during the last week in August, when the whole of Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen" was given at the Royal Court Theatre, which seats between two and three thousand persons. It was pleasing to watch the audience. They listened with rapt attention, and never interrupted the performance by well-meant but ill-timed applause; but at the close of each act they gave striking proofs of the pleasure which they had received. The audience may not have been wholly composed of admirers of Wagner, but no one present, friend or foe, could have refused to recognise the earnest efforts that were made to present in a becoming manner a music-drama bristling with difficulties for actors, orchestra, and stage managers. To hear the work in perfection one must hear it at Bayreuth, but it has not been given there since the year 1876. Munich has a large stage, a fine company, a good orchestra, and an excellent conductor; so, Bayreuth failing, it proved a highly satisfactory substitute.

Wagner's Trilogy, or Tetralogy as it is frequently called, is a work which, to be properly judged, must be frequently seen. As matters now stand it will be a very long time before competent critics, and still longer before the public, have made up their minds as to the exact position which it ought to occupy in the history of the art. Serious performances like those at Munich are at any rate useful helps towards the solution of this important problem. We do not propose to give a detailed account of the four evenings, but to single out some of the points connected with the performances which seem to call for special notice. And, first, we would mention two of the most distinguished members of the Munich troupe—Herr and Frau Vogl. The latter took the part of Fricka in the "Rheingold," and behaved with becoming dignity. But the rôle did not give her powers full scope. It was later on, in "Die Walküre," when she appeared as Brünnhilde, that one discovered how excellent an actress she is. She has a fine and powerful voice, but, alas! voices will not for ever preserve their freshness, and Frau Vogl for many years has been a hard worker in the cause of art, and time and work have left traces. It is wonderful, however, to find her voice as good as it is. Her performance on the second evening was decidedly effective, but it was in "Siegfried" and the "Götterdämmerung" that she achieved the most brilliant success. It is difficult to name special moments where everything was so excellent, but, if called upon to do so, we should mention the closing scene in "Siegfried," when she is on the heights with her hero, and on the last evening the scene when she discovers the treachery, as it appeared to her, of Siegfried. The earnestness of her manner, the bursts of enthusiasm on the one hand, and the looks of scorn or of sorrow on the other, the clearness with which she uttered every word, these and other matters helped to render her impersonation of the unfortunate heroine most impressive. Of Herr Vogl we need not say much, for his name is sufficiently well known in connection with the Bayreuth Festival. He took part in the performances in 1876 when the "Ring" was produced there, and his great merits, both as singer and actor, were universally acknowledged. It was only in last month's MUSICAL TIMES that he was congratulated on his representation of Parsifal at Bayreuth, in July and August, "than which," says the writer, "a finer has never yet been given." At Munich, in the rôle of Siegfried and in that of Siegfried, his acting would have satisfied the most exacting of critics. At times he sang splendidly, but there were moments when he showed signs of fatigue. In the first act of "Siegfried" he was specially fine; and here the wonderfully realistic acting of Herr Schlosser, as the ugly dwarf, Mime, combined to make a striking stage picture. Herr Schlosser must not be dismissed with this one short sentence. We may add that he riveted the attention of his audience to the very last; in the closing scene, when he offers the poisoned beverage to Siegfried, he acted with immense power; one touch of exaggeration would have turned it into pantomime, but Herr Schlosser in every tone and in every gesture was true to the character of the wicked, spiteful dwarf. Of the other personages we would name Herr Gura, who took the somewhat thankless part of Wotan and did justice to it; Herr Siehr, who took the disagreeable part of Hunding in the "Walküre," and the equally disagreeable part of Hagen in the "Götterdämmerung." They are both repulsive, though in totally different ways. Herr Siehr was effective in both rôles. All the other characters were more or less successfully represented, but in nearly every case the acting was good; in some instances the voice was not all that could be desired. The concerted music in the "Walküre," and the choruses in the "Götterdämmerung," were admirably rendered. The orchestra is a remarkably fine one, and is under the direction of one of the most skilful of conductors. Herr Levi does not require our praise; it is sufficient to note that he was chosen by Wagner to conduct the "Parsifal" performances at Bayreuth in 1882. He is quiet in manner, but he knows thoroughly well how to transmit his thoughts and wishes to the players, and they are thoroughly competent to carry them out. The brass seemed somewhat loud at times, but coming direct from Bayreuth it was difficult to forget the subdued tone of the hidden orchestra.

One word in conclusion about the stage. The piece, on the whole, was admirably mounted. The dragon and the bear were not more ludicrous than they were at Bayreuth. There were some beautiful effects of sunrise, sunset, and storm. The swimming scene in the "Rheingold" was well managed, and the death scene and that of the funeral pyre on the last evening were effectively presented. The whole of the "Ring" was announced for repetition in September. The work, indeed, seems to be rather popular just now in Germany, for, besides Munich, it has been given in its entirety twice at Dresden—once last August, and for the second time at the beginning of last month, and from newspaper accounts the performances were highly successful. Frau Materna and Herr Gudehus took part in them.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

ALTHOUGH the local musical season does not fairly open till October, the past month has not been altogether barren of musical incidents, though the majority of them have been of too trivial a character to call for reference in these columns. One really noteworthy performance, however, took place in the Town Hall, on the 8th ult., when Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given as a sort of stirrup-cup to the British Association visitors at the close of their week's congress. The executants were the members of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society, supported by a band of eighty instrumentalists, and assisted by Madame Valleria, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Signor Foli, as vocal principals. Mr. Stockley, as usual, conducted, and Mr. Stimpson presided at the organ. Owing to a northern engagement on the following morning, Madame Valleria was compelled to leave by a somewhat early train, which prevented her singing in the second part of the Oratorio, but her place was very creditably filled at short notice by Miss Eleanor Farnol. The performance, though not exactly a phenomenal one, was, on the whole, very satisfactory and effective, eliciting the hearty and frequent applause of the distinguished company present. So far as the principals were concerned, doubtless, there were no very novel or striking revelations for the audience, who must have often heard the work performed by the same principals elsewhere; but the Birmingham chorus is not easily matched in "Elijah," and local tradition and lengthened experience combined on this occasion to elicit some effects in the choral rendering of the work which evidently impressed the visitors very powerfully. Madame Valleria was in excellent voice, and her rare vocal and dramatic capabilities were displayed throughout the first part to the greatest possible advantage. This was more especially the case in the music of the Shunamite widow, which she sang with thrilling effect. In the chief soprano music of the second part, Miss Farnol acquitted herself with intelligence and fervour, but her voice lacks the weight or volume requisite for the full effect of such a number as "Hear ye, Israel." Miss Hope Glenn was equally effective in the pathetic air "O rest in the Lord," and in the stern admonitory "Woe unto them." Signor Foli was especially good in the bolder and more human phases of the Prophet, and he gave the decisive utterances of Elijah in the scene with the Prophets of Baal, and the florid and fiery air "Is not His word like a fire?" with spirit, energy, and effect. Mr. Barton McGuckin sang the principal tenor music, and especially the melodious air of Obadiah, with sweetness and refinement. The band was occasionally wanting in delicacy and refinement, but there was not much to complain of on this score.

Musical prospects for the coming winter, though not yet fully developed, afford assurance already that there will be no lack of enterprise on the part of our caterers, either as regards choral or orchestral music, but the outlook for the lovers of classical chamber music is not equally encouraging at present. First in order comes the Festival Choral Society, whose twenty-seventh annual season opens on Thursday, the 7th inst., with a performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's too long neglected "Light of the World," originally produced at the Birmingham Festival. Another Birmingham Festival work, Randegger's dramatic Cantata "Fridolin," followed by an orchestral selection, and

The musical score is written for voice and piano. It features a key signature of two flats (B-flat and E-flat) and a common time signature. The score is divided into systems, each containing vocal staves and piano accompaniment. The lyrics are written below the vocal staves. The score includes various musical notations such as notes, rests, and dynamic markings like 'cres.' and 'f'.

The musical score is written for four voices (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and piano accompaniment. It is in 2/4 time and G major. Anderton's "Norman Baron," will furnish the subject-matter of the second Concert, on December 9. For the third Concert, which takes place on February 24, we are promised for the first time here Verdi's "Requiem," which will be bracketed on this occasion with Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," and the series will terminate on March 24 with a performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabeus." The list of principals engaged is an imposing one, including Miss Anna Williams, Madame Georgina Burns, Miss Annie Marriott, Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Damian, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. Gawthrop, Mr. Bridson, Mr. Watkin Mills, Mr. Grice, Mr. Santley, and Signor Foli. There will be full band, organ, and chorus at each performance, with Mr. Stockley as Conductor, and Mr. Stimpson as Organist.

The four subscription Orchestral Concerts of Mr. Stockley, which are also fixed for Thursdays, will alternate judiciously with those of the Choral Society. The first is fixed for the 21st inst., when Miss Fanny Davies, the Birmingham pianist, will play Schumann's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. The programme also comprises a performance of Dr. Villiers Stanford's "Elegiac" Symphony, to be conducted by the composer, and it is intimated that Antonin Dvůřák will probably conduct some important orchestral work at one or other of the remaining Concerts, which are fixed for November 18, February 10, and April 21. The list of vocalists engaged comprises the names of Madame Georgina Burns, Madame Clara Samuelli, Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Grice, and Mr. Leslie Crotty.

A novel and important feature of Messrs. Harrison's Concert prospectus this season is the engagement of the eminent Conductor, Dr. Hans Richter, together with his famous band, for the first performance of the series, which takes place on the 25th inst. Madame Albani will be the leading attraction at the second Concert, and the third will serve to re-introduce Mr. Sims Reeves after a lengthened absence. The last Concert of the series, following the precedent of previous seasons, will be distinguished by the co-operation of Mr. Charles Hallé and his celebrated band. In addition to the artists incidentally named above, Madame Alwina Valleria, Miss Robertson, Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli, Madame Patey, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Signor Foli, Mr. Frederic King, and Mr. Santley, have accepted engagements for one or more of the Concerts. The list of instrumentalists comprises Mr. Charles Hallé, Miss Olson, and Miss Fanny Davies, solo pianists; Madame Norman-Néruda (if in England), Signor Papini, and Miss Nettie Carpenter, solo violin; M. Holmann, solo violoncello; and Signor Bottesini, solo contra-basso. The accompanists will be Messrs. Wilhelm Ganz and Sidney Naylor.

Local music teachers view with concern the gradual development of the teaching functions of the musical section of the Midland Institute, which has this season expanded into a regular Academy of Music, at nominal fees for students, with which no private teacher can pretend to compete. Besides mixed classes under competent professors for the study of solo and choral singing (including the tonic sol-fa system), theory of music, harmony and counterpoint, and the several instruments of the modern orchestra, a special group of ladies' classes, at somewhat higher fees, ranging from half-a-guinea per term upwards, are held on the first three days of the week for instruction in pianoforte and violin playing, theory of music, and singing, both elementary and advanced, for soloists and chorists. In the advanced pianoforte and solo singing classes, the number of students are limited to ten each, and these are selected by the teachers on examination. The nomination of Mr. Stockley as honorary principal of the school is a guarantee for the soundness of the scheme and the quality of the instruction, but it need scarcely be pointed out how seriously the success of the undertaking must affect the position and earnings of unattached members of the musical profession here.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company commenced a series of six nightly performances on the 27th ult., but the only novelty introduced was Marchetti's "Ruy Blas," which has been noticed elsewhere.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

The preliminary sketch of the chief events of our forthcoming season, as given in the September issue, has been since amplified by the publication of the full programme of the Philharmonic Society, which quite fulfils our previous expectations. One of the most notable Concerts will take place on November 9, when "The Spectre's Bride" and the "Walpurgis Night" will sufficiently test the qualities of the chorus, which has undergone several changes. The solo vocalists on this occasion will include Madame Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. John Bridson. Again, on January 11, 1887, "Elijah" is to be given, with an excellent cast of principals, and the last two Concerts of the series will be devoted to Stanford's "Three Holy Children" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," with miscellaneous choral excerpts. The purely orchestral music promises variety if not novelty, the list including Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Mendelssohn's Symphony "The Reformation," Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony, Gade's in C minor, and Haydn's No. 7 in C.

The usual series of eight Orchestral Concerts under the direction of Mr. Charles Hallé, commences in the Philharmonic Hall in November, and with such artists at the first Concert as Madame Albani, Madame Norman-Néruda, and the entrepreneur himself, it is evident that the season will be well inaugurated. The list of Symphonies includes Beethoven's "Eroica," Mendelssohn's "Italian" in A, and Berlioz's "Fantastique" in C, in addition to a first production, as far as Liverpool is concerned, of Schumann's No. 4 in D minor, Haydn's No. 30 in A major, Dvůřák's No. 2 in D minor, and Hans Huber's "Summer Nights." Amongst the Overtures to be produced are Beethoven's "Leonora," Nos. 1, 2 and 3, and "Fidelio," Berlioz's "Les Francs Juges," Goldmark's "Penthesilea," Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and Smetana's "Lustspiel," the last three being starred as novelties. The miscellaneous work also promises to be interesting by the inclusion of Saint-Saëns's ballet music from "Henry VIII.," Fuchs' Serenade in C, and a Scherzo Capriccio by Dvůřák.

The choral competitions which were held in the large Concert Hall of the Liverpool Exhibition at the close of August, were not only interesting in themselves, but evidenced the high state of refinement and delicate treatment which have been attained by many of our provincial choirs. The first prize of £100 was gained by the Nottingham Society, a result generally anticipated in view of the fame which this praiseworthy body of singers has earned elsewhere. The bands which have recently performed at the Exhibition comprise, amongst others, the Coldstream Guards and the Royal Horse Guards Blue (under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Godfrey), and M. Riviere's excellent stringed orchestra; and the organists who have given Recitals on the large organ include Mr. W. T. Best, Mr. H. L. Balfour, and Mr. J. Kendrick Pyne, City Organist at Manchester.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

DURING the summer months there are, in the provincial towns, very few musical doings worthy of being chronicled. The autumnal festivals generally give the first evidences of renewed vigour, and of the spreading abroad of that artistic bustle which is, in the middle of the year, almost entirely confined to London. But when the Metropolitan activity lulls our commences, and during the winter months keeps us warm and lively.

So far, however, we enjoy little beyond the hope of returning animation; we have scarcely advanced further than the first signs of vitality. Our choral societies are summoning their faithful members to resume their drill and to prepare for their winter campaign; but no distinct announcement of exciting programmes has issued from any of them. The new cantatas, &c., do not appear to have so captivated our leaders as to have commanded their devoted allegiance. Perhaps after the Leeds Festival, plans may begin to assume a more positive shape, but just yet we are in a state of vague expectancy.

Mr. Hallé and Mr. de Jong will meet their friends at the Free Trade Hall toward the close of October, but before that we shall have an opportunity of welcoming the former gentleman as a solo player. Mr. Hallé's Afternoon Recitals formed such an attractive portion of last year's undertakings, connected with what are styled the "Gentlemen's Concerts," that it is not strange that, out of eighteen performances announced for the next season, the popular conductor has been secured for eight interpretations of piano-forte music, the influence of which will be vastly increased by the programmes being arranged to illustrate the gradual progression of modern work. From Handel and Bach to Brahms and Liszt is a wide range, and should afford plenty of scope for diversified programmes, and for the education, as well as entertainment, of the subscribers. Orchestral performances must always be, to a certain extent, unsatisfactory in so small a room as the Concert Hall, and, not unwisely, the directors of that Institution undertake to give only five during the season. At four Chamber Concerts Signor Piatti will appear, to the great delight of his many admirers here. Madame Norman-Néruda and Herr Straus will alternate as first violinists. I must regret that no engagement of our able local quartet party, under Signor Risegari's able superintendence, is promised. Unless the "Gentlemen's Concerts" are largely utilised for the encouragement and display of whatever is best and choicest in our local talent they will utterly fail to obtain, or deserve, that public support for which they now, after a somewhat feeble middle life, appeal as the only hope for a continued existence. On the other hand, the purely amateur celebrations of the last two seasons do not seem to have so commended themselves to the subscribers as to have led to their continuance.

Since the above was written, Mr. Hallé has issued his prospectus. His orchestra will again consist of one hundred performers, and will, during the season, be engaged in the representation of many new works—including Brahms's Fourth Symphony (in E minor), Dvorák's D minor Symphony (No. 2), and Huber's "Summer Nights," as well as in Goldmark's Overture "Penthesilea," Smetana's "Lustspiel" Overture, and Dvorák's "Husitska." Among the lighter orchestral pieces will be given Rubinstein's "Bal Costumé," Saint-Saëns's Ballet Music from "Henry VIII.," and Dvorák's "Scherzo Capriccioso."

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will sing at the first Concert, and will be followed by Madame Albani, Madame Hastreiter, Miss Wynant, Mdlle. Schneider, and many old favourites. The second part of the first programme will consist of works by Liszt. We shall have the pleasure of welcoming, among the soloists, not only Madame Norman-Néruda and Herr Joachim, but also Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Herr Stavenhagen, and Herr Franz Ondricek, so that considerable variety will be provided.

At the Town Hall Mr. Pyne has resumed his attractive Saturday evening Recitals, and at the Cathedral the organ (which has for more than a year been silent, during the repairing of the building) will very soon be again heard.

Messrs. Forsyth announce a Pianoforte Recital by Liszt's talented pupil, Mr. Frederic Lamond. I am sorry that the date (the 14th inst.) will clash with the Leeds Festival, which is sure to attract many of the lovers of music in this neighbourhood.

Mr. J. H. Mapleson promises Italian Opera at the Theatre Royal, commencing on Monday, the 18th inst. The singers announced are either veterans or entirely unknown here; but mysterious hints are offered respecting the possibility of a "new planet of the first magnitude."

Mr. Carl Rosa has given us a fortnight of Opera in English. As no novelty has been vouchsafed, and only a single performance given of one comparatively new work ("Nadeshda"), the short visit calls for little remark. Perhaps the want of a suitable heroine for the later English operas justifies a course which can aid but very slightly the advance of a national school of dramatic music.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THERE are everywhere indications of renewed musical activity in the West Riding, and next month will find Concert-rooms crowded in almost every town of consequence in the county. Last season was thought to be an unusually busy one in respect of the multiplicity of musical events, but the prospect before us is even more promising. Before indicating some of the chief Concerts which are announced to be held during the winter, reference should be made to one feature of the al fresco music which has been provided during the summer months—namely, the introduction of open-air Concerts on Sunday afternoons. These have been held pretty generally in the large towns with the object of raising funds for hospital purposes. Judging by the enormous attendance at most of these Concerts the movement is one which seems to fit in agreeably with the wishes of the public. As a rule, no charge is made for admission, but collecting sheets, placed at appropriate points, form a convenient channel for the offerings of the public. The music, of course, is all sacred, and the selection of choruses of the Handelian type enables the promoters to dispense with the labour of preparation, almost every choir in Yorkshire being able to go through the best known choruses without much difficulty. It is probable that next year this mode of improving the extremely dull Sunday afternoons of provincial towns will undergo marked development.

With regard to forthcoming engagements, it needs not to be said that the approaching Triennial Festival at Leeds is foremost in the thoughts of everyone. The works to be produced are in active rehearsal, and the officers are deeply immersed in the enormous work of organisation and ticket selling. The Festival promises to be a great success.

Mr. Ford has announced a series of six popular Concerts, extending over the period between November 17 and March 16, the opening Concert being devoted to the production of Berlioz's "Faust." The principals named for the occasion are those who have usually been associated with the best performances of the work in England, and the Philharmonic Society will take part in the choruses. Mr. Hallé will occupy the conductor's desk. With one exception the rest of the Concerts will consist of chamber music, the exception being that announced for December, which will be given by Mr. Hallé's band. Herr Joachim is not to appear till the final Concert in March, when he will be accompanied by a quartet party, to include Signor Piatti. The Philharmonic Society, which continues under the conductorship of Mr. Alfred Broughton, has made arrangements for three Concerts. At the first, to be held in December, will be produced "The Light of the World" (Sullivan), and for the second, in March, Mozart's "Requiem," and Handel's "Acis and Galatea" are announced. The third, or extra Concert, as it is called, is the Christmas performance of "The Messiah," for which Madame Albani, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills are engaged. Herr Schiever (leader of Dr. Richter's band) is to officiate as leader at each of the three Concerts.

Mr. Edgar Haddock announces a third series of Musical Evenings, extending from November to March. The Temperance Choral Society is actively engaged in rehearsal, and other similar Societies are also at work on preparatory studies. Some indication of the progress which is going on may be gathered from the fact that two schools of music, with thoroughly equipped staffs of professors, are now at work in Leeds. The older Institution, the Yorkshire Training College of Music, has recently been located in new premises, and is under the direction of Mr. Whewall Bowling, who has succeeded his brother, the late Mr. J. P. Bowling. Of the late principal professor it may be remarked, in passing, that he was perhaps unsurpassed in Yorkshire as a pianist, and he had many other qualities which surrounded him with a wide circle of friends. Publicly he laboured unselfishly in the interests of music, and, although unostentatious, his presence will be very much missed. Herr Alfred Christensen is the director of the new school which has been dignified with the appellation of Conservatoire, and which is to be conducted on the principles of the leading Continental Conservatoires.

The prospect held out for the season at Bradford is pleasing. First and foremost must be mentioned the programme of the Bradford Subscription Concerts, which have done infinitely more than any other institution in the town to foster music. An addition has been made this year to the number of the Concerts, and for the same subscription purchasers of tickets will have the privilege of attending seven instead of six Concerts. Three of the seven will consist entirely of orchestral music, in the last of which Herr Joachim will take part. Mdle. Antoinette Trebelli and Mdle. Schneider are announced as vocalists for the first and second Orchestral Concerts. Of the remaining four, two will be Choral, one Chamber, and one Ballad Concerts. "St. Paul" will be produced in December, and "The Spectre's Bride," and, among other items, a selection from Berlioz's "Childhood of Christ," in February. Mr. Lloyd and Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will take part in Mendelssohn's Oratorio, and the principals at the second Choral Concert will be Miss Marriott, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. At the Chamber Concert, in November, the executants will be Madame Néruda, Mr. Hallé, Herr Straus, Signor Piatti, and Herr Protagatzky. For the Ballad Concert the services of Madame Valleria, Signor Foli, and M. Nachéz (violinist) have been retained. The approaching season will witness the introduction of a new venture in the shape of a series of Popular Concerts for Bradford, intended, so far as one can judge, to serve somewhat the same purpose as the Popular Concerts so excellently conducted by Mr. Ford at Leeds. Considering the standard of efficiency aimed at, they promise to be amazingly cheap from the public point of view. The series will comprise nine Concerts. At the first, which is announced to take place during October, the Chevalier Emil Bach and Miss Thudichum will appear. Without enumerating in detail the various Concerts, it may be stated that the December programme will consist entirely of works by English composers, and that at another Concert Dr. C. H. Parry's Suite, written for the recent Gloucester Festival, will be included in the programme. Mr. Cowen and Mr. Prout are to appear as conductors at Concerts which will include some of their compositions. A local orchestra, recently formed under the direction of Mr. Sewell, will play on each occasion.

The Bradford Festival Choral Society promise interesting Concerts, notably one at which C. H. Lloyd's Cantata "The Song of Balder," written for the Hereford Festival of last year, will be produced. Chamber music, in addition to that to be provided by the Subscription Concerts and the Popular Concerts, will be abundant, Mr. Midgley and Mr. Midale having made announcements which will doubtless gratify a wide circle of musicians. In November Madame Albani will give a Concert in St. George's Hall, on which occasion she will be assisted by several accomplished artists, including Signor Bottesini.

The Huddersfield Subscription Concerts will be resumed, and at Halifax, Keighley, and other smaller towns the season promises to be fruitful of interesting events.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

The approaching musical season in Bristol promises to be one of considerable and varied interest. The different Societies have already sent out notices of rehearsals to be begun almost immediately, in preparation for Concerts to be given during the winter, and an unusual number of novelties appear in their schemes. Whether all these will be eventually performed is not certain, but we furnish below as complete a list of the works intended to be given as can at present be obtained.

The Bristol Musical Festival Society announce two Concerts for November 26 and 27, when Berlioz's "Faust," Beethoven's "Egredi," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," together with miscellaneous items, will form the programmes. The last two works are old favourites with the Festival Choir, and the "Faust," which was somewhat imperfectly given at the Festival last autumn, will doubtless obtain a more satisfactory rendering this year. The painstaking chorusmaster, Mr. D. Rootham, is doing his best to enforce thorough study of the work and punctual attendance at rehearsals on the part of the choir. Madame Albani, Signor Foli, and Signor Bottesini are announced as soloists.

As we have said before, there is to be a series of six Monday Popular Concerts during the autumn, as the funds of the Society do not warrant the Committee in promising more at present. If these Concerts should pay their expenses, however, we may possibly look forward to another short series in the spring. A serious deficit, to the amount of £200, was exhibited in the accounts at the end of last season, and for this the Reserve Fund has to be drawn upon, and therefore the Committee does not feel justified in announcing more than six Concerts for the present. We must add that the "mind of Bristol" upon the subject of these excellent Concerts must finally be made up this year, whether to support them or to let them drop. There is the certainty of possessing one of the finest local orchestras in the country, with a choir to equal it, under one of the most enterprising and resolute of Conductors, open to the city, and it is for her to decide if she will keep them or no. If not, she will probably have to part with many of her leading musicians, who must naturally betake themselves where talent is more generously recognised. It should not be forgotten, moreover, that the three years for which Mr. George Riseley promised his voluntary services are now expired, and that were it not for his kindness in willingly resuming his position of honorary Conductor, the Concerts must even now have fallen to the ground. The dates fixed are as follows:—the 11th and 23rd inst., November 8 and 22, December 6 and 20. The Symphonies to be given are "Leonora" (Raff), "Roméo et Juliette" and "Episode in the life of an Artist" (Berlioz), New Symphony (E. Prout), No. 1 in F (Goetz), No. 7 in C (Haydn). Overtures—"In Memoriam" (Sullivan), "King Lear" and "Les Franc Juges" (Berlioz), "Dramatic" (Rosalind Ellicott). Entr'actes, &c.—Ballet Music, "Henry VIII." (Saint-Saëns); Ballet Music, "Sylvia" (Déliès); Ballet Music, "Colomba" (Mackenzie); Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa" and "Les Préludes" (Liszt); Violin Concerto in E, and "Midsummer Night's Dream," the complete work (Mendelssohn). With such a varied and interesting list of works, surely the attendance at each Concert should fill Colston Hall to overflowing.

The Saturday Popular Concerts will again be continued, under the direction of Mr. George Gordon. Several of the programmes are to be, as usual, entirely miscellaneous, but two works are to be given for the first time—viz., "The Fairy Ring" (W. H. Cummings) and J. L. Hatton's Cantata "Robin Hood," as well as several old favourites, including Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" and Mozart's Twelfth Mass. The band will be the same as before, and Mr. G. Riseley will be the Organist.

Mrs. Viner Pomeroy's Classical Chamber Concerts are to be continued, and we trust that they may be more adequately supported. The works to be performed are not yet fixed. A series of four Chamber Concerts will also be given as last year, in the Victoria Rooms, with the same performers—viz., violin, Mr. Arthur Hudson; violoncello, Mr. E. Pavey; and grand piano, Miss Mary Lock, R.A.M.

There will probably be more than the usual number of Choral Concerts. The Bristol Madrigal Society will celebrate its Jubilee in January, on which occasion Mr. Henry Leslie, Mr. Samuel Reay, Mr. W. A. Barrett (of London), and Dr. Mann (of Cambridge) will probably be present to hear works of their own, composed especially for this Concert. The Orpheus Glee Society will hold its annual "Ladies' Night" on the last Thursday before Lent, and will doubtless present a most attractive programme.

Mr. John Barrett's choir will give the usual annual Concert, though the programme is not yet definitely fixed. At present Macfarren's "Lady of the Lake," Bruch's "Schön Ellen," and Jensen's "Feast of Adonis" are all under rehearsal, one of which will form the principal item of the evening, and the Conductor also intends to bring forward several works by local writers.

We fear that it is not intended that special Advent and Lent services, with band and augmented choir, should take place in the Cathedral, although the services formerly held were greatly appreciated. However, the grand old church of St. Mary, Redcliffe, seems to wish to fill the gap thus made by the mother church, and it is intended to give there, at the special seasons, the following works:—Sporh's "Last Judgment," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and the 95th Psalm; Haydn's "Seven Last Words," and Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus." On each occasion there will be an efficient orchestra and largely increased choir.

The Society of Bristol Gleemen, which was formed early this year, will most likely give its first Concert in the spring. It is also proposed to form a Society, to be called "The Bristol Philharmonic Society," and three Concerts are to be given by this body at the Victoria Rooms during the winter.

Organ Recitals will be given at Colston Hall, as usual, by Mr. G. Risleley.

We hear with pleasure that the members of the Plymouth Vocal Association are now actively preparing, under their indefatigable Conductor, Mr. F. N. Lohr, for the winter Concerts. At the first of these Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be performed, with Miss Anna Williams, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Piercy, and Signor Foli as principal vocalists. "The Messiah" will be given at Christmas as usual, and Gounod's "Mors et Vita" will form the programme of the third. The artists on this occasion will be Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Frederic King. Mr. Lohr has filled most worthily the post of honorary Conductor to this Society for nearly twenty years, and richly deserves the thanks of all lovers of music for his unwearied efforts to present, at each Concert, a fitting performance of the works selected.

At Exeter, the announcements, so far, for the coming season are Mr. Farley Sinkins' Subscription Concerts (morning and evening) on the 25th inst. In December, the Concerts of the Madrigal, Orchestral, and Oratorio Societies will be given. The latter Society has been reorganised, with new rules and officers, and will give the "Messiah" at the first Concert, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Lyon.

The Western Counties' Musical Association's Annual Festival Concerts will comprise Handel's "Judas Macabeus," and a miscellaneous orchestral and vocal Concert.

The Victoria Hall Organ Recitals, by Mr. D. J. Wood, will be resumed on the first or second Saturday this month.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

THE arrangements for the forthcoming musical season are being actively pushed forward. The Choral Union, under the direction of Mr. Manns, will, as usual, give a series of Orchestral and Choral Concerts, the principal items already announced being Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," and Schubert's "Song of Miriam."

Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda will give their accustomed series of Concerts, the first taking place early in November.

Dr. Hans Richter announces two Orchestral Concerts, also at the beginning of the season.

Mr. Kirkhope and Mr. Waddell announce that their respective choral societies will shortly resume practice, the former beginning with Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" and the latter with Max Bruch's "Odysseus."

Amongst Pianoforte Recitals, an early re-appearance of the talented young pianist, Mr. Lamond, whose performances last year created so much interest, is promised.

Music in the Exhibition has gone on uninterrupted during the whole summer, and has been principally supplied by military bands. Noteworthy among these have been the performances of the Royal Artillery Band, from Woolwich, under the conductorship of Mr. Xavertal. The selections played by this band, which combines strings with the usual military instruments, have been much appreciated by the visitors.

The death is announced of Mr. J. C. Paton, well known in this city as a teacher of music and a musician of considerable talent. His untimely decease is much regretted by all who knew him.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND WEST OF SCOTLAND.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Glasgow Choral Union has now completed, or nearly completed, its arrangements for the ensuing season. The Concerts will begin on Monday, December 6, and the last will take place on February 12, 1887. Thirteen of these will be subscribers' Concerts, four of which will be Choral and nine Orchestral. There will be the usual Saturday popular nights.

Two new works will be performed at the Choral Subscription Concerts—namely, Sir Arthur Sullivan's Cantata "The Golden Legend" and Dr. Villiers Stanford's Ballad, for chorus and orchestra, "The Revenge," both written for the Leeds Festival of this year. These compositions will be produced together at the Concert of December 14. Other choral works not heard here for some time, and to be given on January 18 next, are Bach's "Thou Guide of Israel," Schubert's "Song of Miriam," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." As will be noticed, variety and brevity will be characteristic features of the choral part of the scheme this year. Mendelssohn's Oratorio "St. Paul," which has not had a place in the Choral Union programmes for a considerable period, is to be performed on February 10, and there will be the usual New Year's Day performance of Handel's "Messiah," these two compositions adding some needed massiveness and breadth to the choral series. Details of the Orchestral performances are not yet completed, but it is understood that several important new works will be brought forward. The whole of Beethoven's Symphonies are to be produced during the season, concluding with, of course, No. 9, "The Choral."

The list of vocalists with whom engagements are concluded comprises Madame Valleria, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Marian Burton, Mr. W. H. Brereton, and Signor Foli, with other names less known in Glasgow. It includes, also, I am glad to see, Mr. A. Black, a really excellent baritone of local reputation, who, I am sure, will not disappoint the expectations formed of him. The solo pianists engaged are Herr Bernhard Stavenhagen, Mr. Max Pauer, and Miss Fanny Davies, the latter of whom made a good impression here last season, as elsewhere. Pan Franz Ondricek, and Herr M. Sons, are the solo violinists. Herr Sons will be the leading violin as formerly, the valuable services of Mr. Manns have again been secured as Conductor, and Mr. Allan Macbeth continues to fill the less noticed but nevertheless important post of chorus-trainer.

The Partick Choral Society, which is one of the oldest Associations of the kind in the neighbourhood of our city, intends practising Haydn's "Creation" and Mendelssohn's "Loreley," together with some part-songs. The choir of Queen's Park Established Church will practise Gaul's Cantata "Ruth." The Rutherglen Choral Society has taken up a new work, the composition of Mr. William Hume, entitled "Blind Bartimeus." The Kyrle Choir intends confining itself, meantime, at least, to part-songs, Mr. C. H. Woolnoth now acting as Conductor.

Haydn's "Creation" will be the leading choral performance at Paisley this season, by the local Choral Union. The Heckmann Quartet has been engaged for another Concert, also a vocal party from the Carl Rosa Opera Company, the Union appearing in some choral selections. The Paisley scheme will evidently be of rather restricted dimensions this season. The Girvan Choral Society is to produce Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and Hume's "Blind Bartimeus." The latter work is likewise to be included in the arrangements for the season of the Johnstone United Presbyterian Musical Society, which is under the direction of Mr. Allan. At Airdrie Haydn's "Creation" will form the winter's study, in view of the usual yearly Concert.

Most of the Musical Societies in Glasgow and the district, however, have not yet fixed on their work for the new season, and information on the subject will thus have to stand over till next issue.

We are to have two Concerts by the Richter Orchestra in the first week of November. I need hardly give readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES the particulars of the programmes. Suffice it to say that Wagner has the usual large place in them. At the same time, it is gratifying to find that Mr. Mackenzie's Scotch Rhapsody is included.

Mr. Frederic Lamond, the talented young pianist, of whom his townsmen are naturally very proud, is to give a Recital at the end of October or beginning of November.

At one of the recent weekly social meetings of the Glasgow Society of Musicians a paper was read by Mr. Andrew Myles, President of the Glasgow Choral Union, descriptive of the late operatic performances at Bayreuth, attendance at which he had included in a holiday trip to the Continent. Mr. Myles was enthusiastic in his praise of most of what he saw and heard, but he found "Tristan and Isolde" somewhat slow. Architectural drawings of the theatre were exhibited by Mr. Myles, who is by profession an architect.

OBITUARY.

JOHN L. HATTON.—This well-known musician passed away suddenly at his Margate residence, on Monday, the 20th ult. He had long been infirm, and compelled to take exercise in a wheeled chair, but otherwise his health was fairly good, no anticipation of speedy decease being entertained. Almost to the last the cheery old gentleman maintained his usual spirits. During the late Mr. J. W. Davison's sojourn in Margate, Hatton would sometimes be wheeled up to the York Hotel, and there the two veterans would fight their battles o'er again to the amusement of the listeners. Notable hands were they both at "spinning a yarn," and the memory of their stories will not soon die. Hatton was born in Liverpool, October 12, 1809, and picked up his musical education as best he could, under the stimulus of genuine artistic impulses. He came to London in 1832, soon making himself known alike by energy and talent. Both as composer and conductor he worked hard. After fulfilling an engagement at Drury Lane, where (1844) his first opera, "The Queen of the Thames," was produced, Hatton spent some time abroad, subsequently returning to share the glories of Charles Kean's Shakespearian revivals at the Princess's Theatre. Hatton presided over the orchestra throughout the series, and wrote incidental music for most of the plays produced. Much of his time was spent in connection with theatres; this, as may be supposed, not tending to the serious employment of his undoubted talent as a creative musician. In that capacity Hatton began very well indeed—a fact of which all who are acquainted with the set of songs published under the name of "Czapek" can testify. To these belong the famous "Anthea," and others less known but almost equally good. Their composer might have been the English Schubert had he persevered on the same high level, but he took to writing more for the many than the cultivated few, and was encouraged in this course by very great popular success. Among his best known songs and part-songs are "Good-bye, Sweetheart," which Mario loved so well; "Simon the Cellarer," "The Friar of Orders Grey," and "Our ship now goes." These, and others of their kind, will long keep his name alive. His works for the stage made but little mark, nor did his Cantata "Robin Hood," or his Oratorio "Hezekiah," survive. His church services and anthems were scarcely more fortunate. Hatton, in point of fact, was a lyrical composer, who had a sympathetic nature, the gift of tune, and enough musicianship for the effective handling of his subjects. In private life he was a boon companion and a favourite.

WE have received a circular from Dr. Henry Hiles calling attention to a series of papers now publishing in the Quarterly Musical Review, at Manchester, on the "Education of Cathedral Choristers," and stating that he would be glad to have a detailed statement of the present arrangements in each of our large choral foundations with respect to provision:—(1) For the efficient training of the choir-boys in music, in addition to their direct preparation for their actual work in the service; (2) For their general education; and (3) For their board and lodging. Information is also desired as to any help systematically afforded to the boys when they leave the choir, or any supervision exercised over their after-life. It is necessary that communications on this subject should be addressed to Dr. Hiles, Evington, Northumberland Street, Higher Broughton, Manchester, before Christmas.

THE competition for the John Thomas Welsh Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music, took place on the 23rd ult. The examiners were Messrs. F. R. Cox, H. C. Lunn, Walter Macfarren, John Thomas, F. Westlake, and the Principal (Chairman). There were six candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Aneurin Jenkins.

ORGAN Recitals have been given on the new organ at Canterbury Cathedral during the past month by Dr. Bridge, Dr. Longhurst, Dr. Warwick Jordan, Dr. Pringuer, and Mr. Jekyll.

THE prospectus of the thirty-first series of the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts announces that the season will commence on the 16th inst., the principal points in the programmes of the ten Concerts before Christmas being as follows:—At the first Concert Beethoven's Symphony, No. 1, in C, Massenet's Spanish Ballet from "Le Cid" (first time in England), and Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, with Miss Fanny Davies at the solo instrument; vocalist, Miss Ella Russell. The second Concert (23rd inst.) will be in memory of Franz Liszt, and will include his Symphonic Poems, "Les Préludes" and "The Ideal," the "Hungarian Fantasia," and the Pianoforte Concerto in A (No. 2); pianist, Mr. Walter Bache, and vocalists, Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel. At the third Concert (30th inst.) Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the Prelude to the third act of "Tannhäuser" (first time at these Concerts), Overtures, "Coriolan" (Beethoven) and "Waverley" (Berlioz), and Volckmann's Violoncello Concerto, to be played by Herr Julius Klengel; vocalist, Miss Ella Russell. The fourth Concert (November 6) will be devoted to Dvořák's Leeds Festival Oratorio, "Saint Ludmila," conducted by the composer; principal vocalists, Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley; the choruses to be sung by Novello's Choir. At the fifth Concert (November 13) Gade's Violin Concerto, played for the first time, Mr. John Dunn being solo violinist; F. H. Cowen's "Festival Overture" (composed for the opening of the Liverpool Exhibition, 1885), Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony, and Wagner's Introduction to "Tristan und Isolde," as adapted by the composer for performance at Concerts; vocalist, Mr. Sims Reeves. At the sixth Concert (November 20) Berlioz's Sacred Trilogy "The Childhood of Christ" will be given (for the first time at these Concerts), Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Henry Piercy, Mr. Robert Hilton, and Mr. Santley, being the principal vocalists. At the seventh Concert (November 27) F. Praeger's new "Symphonic Fantasia" (first time), a selection from Mackenzie's Opera "The Troubadour," and Beethoven's Violin Concerto, performed by Pan F. Ondricek; vocalist, Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli. At the eighth Concert (December 4) Sir Arthur Sullivan's Leeds Festival Cantata "The Golden Legend" will be given, conducted by the composer; principal vocalists, Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Frederic King, the choruses by Novello's Choir. At the ninth Concert (December 11), conducted by Sir Arthur Sullivan, Overture "The Sapphire Necklace" and incidental music to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" (Sullivan), Beethoven's Symphony in B flat (No. 4), and Pianoforte Concerto in G; pianist, Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg, and vocalist, Miss Agnes Jansen. The tenth Concert (December 18), in celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Weber, will be exclusively devoted to the works of that composer; vocalist, Mrs. Hutchinson; pianist, Herr Bernhard Stavenhagen; clarinet, Mr. G. A. Clinton. With the exception of the fourth, sixth, eighth, and ninth, the whole of the Concerts will be conducted by Mr. August Manns. For the second ten Concerts of the series we are promised A. C. Mackenzie's new Cantata "The Story of Sayid," "The Revenge," for chorus and orchestra, by C. Villiers Stanford (both conducted by their composers); a new Symphony by E. Prout; an orchestral Scene, "The Forest of Arden," by H. Gadsby (performed at one of the Philharmonic Concerts last season), and a new Serenade for orchestra, by George J. Bennett.

THE opening Services at the Church of the Holy Trinity, Paris (concerning which we wrote last month), took place on Sunday, the 12th ult. The first was at nine o'clock, followed by one at eleven, when the Service was Dr. Garrett's in E flat, with Introit by Dr. Tuckerman. Even-song was at four o'clock, when Dr. Garrett's Cantate and Deus in E flat, and Barnby's Anthem "O how amiable," with processional Hymns, were sung. The whole of the music, which was excellently performed by the choir, was under the direction of Mr. Stedman. The precentor, Mr. Wright E. Post, will have the valuable assistance of Mr. Seker, who is well known in Paris as an admirable teacher of singing. The church, an excellent example of the late G. E. Street, is admirably adapted for musical purposes, and the new choir starts with every prospect of a great success.

WE quote the following from the Daily Telegraph:—"FRANZ LISZT.—The contents of the great composer's will have been made known through his lawyer and confidential adviser, Dr. Brichta, who went from Vienna to Weimar in order to arrange affairs. The will was dated August 15, 1861, and constituted the Princess of Sayn-Wittgenstein as 'universal heir.' It had been drawn up in solemn form, occupied only a sheet of letter paper, and had been deposited for safe keeping with the proper tribunal at Weimar, then the usual residence of Liszt. Both his daughters and his mother were then alive. The provisions which the will contains for the benefit of his mother have been discharged by her death in 1864. As to the daughters, the testator directs that their fortunes, which were deposited with the house of Rothschild at Frankfurt, shall be paid over to them. The interest of these capital sums was paid to Mesdames Blandine Ollivier and Wagner from the time of their marriages, and the capital sums were also paid over to them long since. The legatee is to have supreme discretion and control over the publication of any manuscript works which Liszt may leave behind, is to have all the presents made to him at various periods of his career, is to discharge his wishes in regard to friends which he may communicate to her orally or by writing, and may dispose at pleasure of all the scores and other manuscripts of various composers, and all other music which may be in his possession at the time of his death. It is believed that the value of what has been left is not considerable, except the presents, which are numerous and costly, and the music. By the wish of the Grand-Duke, Liszt's house at Weimar will be preserved in the condition in which he left it, as a memorial of the artist."

UNDER the auspices of the Llandaff Diocesan Church Choral Association, an interesting Festival was held on the 16th ult., at the Parish Church, Usk. Contingents were furnished from the choirs of Newport, Tintern, Caerleon, Usk, Marshfield, Abertillery, and other places in Monmouthshire, numbering about 450 voices. Mr. Richard Seaton, choirmaster, Margam Abbey, conducted as usual; Mr. C. C. Caird, Llanthwy, presided at the organ, and the auxiliary band, consisting of about twelve string and wind instruments, was led by Mr. Sewell, Pontypool. The anthems "O come let us worship" (arranged from Himmel) and "We never will bow down" ("Judas Maccabeus") were sung. In the course of an apposite sermon, the Very Rev. the Dean of Asaph said he often wondered whether favourite hymns so-called would be so if they were not identified with favourite tunes. There was such a thing as singing with the voice, without singing either with the spirit or the understanding. That solemn dialogue between the soul and the Saviour, "Art thou weary, art thou languid," was an illustration of beautiful words being set to worldly music. The music originally written for that hymn had long since been entombed in an Oxford church, where choral services were a thing of the past, and the hymn was wedded to a bright and cheerful tune which fell very far short of the solemnity of the words. Those on whom the choice of hymns rested should be careful about asking congregations to sing such verses, for English hymnology was full of glorious songs, not only strong and full in their tune, but lofty and noble in their meaning.

THE members of the St. George's Glee Union gave their 217th consecutive monthly Concert on the 3rd ult., in the Pimlico Rooms, Warwick Street. Although in the height of the holiday season, the audience was as large as usual, and the Concert was highly successful. Miss Amy Sargent, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. W. Nicholl, and Mr. J. Donnell Balfe were the vocalists, and Mr. E. Stoeger played two pianoforte solos. The part-songs included compositions by Mendelssohn, Bridge, Reay, Stirling, Bishop, Martin, and Distin. Mr. E. R. Terry presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

THE annual Service of the Guild of St. Matthew was held at St. John's, Waterloo Road, on Monday evening, the 20th ult., when the sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Shuttleworth, Rector of St. Nicholas, Cole Abbey. Barnby's setting in E was used for the canticles, and the anthem was Mendelssohn's "How lovely are the messengers." The musical portion of the Service was under the direction of Mr. Henry J. B. Dart.

THE prospectus of Mr. J. A. Mathews' Choral and Orchestral Society, at Cheltenham, promises three Subscription Oratorio Concerts during the season 1886-7, at the first of which, on November 23, Handel's "Messiah" will be given, with full band and eminent solo vocalists. The second Concert will take place after Christmas, in honour of the Queen's Jubilee, when appropriate music will be performed; and the third will be given in aid of a local object. The classes will be continued in Handel Hall (lately acquired); musical lectures will be given (the first by the President of the Society, Sir Herbert Oakley, Mus. Doc.); and the amateur division for instrumentalists will have separate practice for the public performances. The singing competition will take place in the spring, and will be open to members of the choral and elementary classes only. The annual examinations of vocal and instrumental music, in connection with Trinity College, London, are appointed for November 12 and 13 next, and those in musical knowledge for June 10, 1887. The practices commenced at Handel Hall on the 14th ult.

THE prospectus of the Institute Choral and Music Classes at the Bow and Bromley Institute, for the session 1886-7, announces that a Popular Concert will be given on the 19th inst., the proceeds of which are to be devoted to meet the loss on last season's Subscription Concerts. The programme will contain F. H. Cowen's "Rose Maiden," and Sir George Macfarren's Cantata for female voices "Songs in a Cornfield," with a miscellaneous selection. The meetings of the Institute Choir are on Tuesday evenings; and the Elementary Singing Class, for sight singing on the Tonic Sol-fa method, and the Intermediate Singing Class (for those who have already passed through an Elementary Class), on Fridays, the former at 8.15 and the latter at 7 p.m. In addition to the works already named, Sullivan's Cantata "The Golden Legend," "The Revenge" by C. Villiers Stanford, and other works composed for the Leeds Festival, as well as Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night," will be performed during the season. Mr. W. G. McNaught continues to act as Conductor.

THE prospectus of the Finsbury Choral Association for its eighth season, 1886-7, promises three Subscription Concerts, in the Holloway Hall, the first, on December 9, being devoted to Gaul's "Holy City," and W. H. Cummings' Cantata, "The Fairy Ring"; vocalists, Madame Clara Samuelli, Miss Emily Davies, Madame Isabel Fassett, Messrs. W. J. Davey, John Probert, and W. G. Forington; the second on February 10, 1887, to Haydn's "Creation," the solos by Miss Bertha Moore, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Frederic King; and the third, on March 24, to Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Prout's Cantata "Alfred," Miss Mary Davies, Miss Mary Middleton, Mr. Charles Chiley, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint sustaining the principal parts. The Conductor of the Society is Mr. C. J. Dale; but "The Fairy Ring" and "Alfred" will be performed under the personal direction of their composers. At an extra Concert, on Good Friday, April 8, 1887, "The Messiah" will be given, the solo parts by Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Alice Heale, Messrs. Reginald Groome and Bridson.

THE London Symphony Concerts, under the conductorship of Mr. Henschel, will commence at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday evening, November 17. Sixteen Concerts will be given, extending to March 16, 1887. The orchestra will consist of upwards of seventy-four of the best resident performers; leader, Mr. Carodus. There will be thirteen evening and three afternoon Concerts, the first part of the programme, as a rule, consisting of an overture, a solo, and a symphony, the second part including music of a lighter style.

THE prospectus of Mr. Spark's Subscription Concerts, at Worcester, for the coming season announces the engagement of Madame Valleria, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Madame Laura Smart, Signor Foli, Mr. Josef Cantor's Operatic Concert Company; M. Tivadar Nachez, Herr Poznanski, and Mr. T. Shaw (violin), Mr. V. L. Needham (flute), Mr. J. Bell (cornet), and Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte). Three Concerts will be given, commencing on the 25th inst.

THE prospectus of the Sunderland Philharmonic Society (under the direction of Mr. Kilburn, Mus. Bac., Cantab.) announces, for the season 1886-87, three Subscription Concerts. The programme of the first, on the 15th inst., will be miscellaneous, and includes Gounod's Anthem "By Babylon's Wave" and Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer." At the second, on February 14, 1887, Dvorák's Cantata "The Spectre's Bride" will be given, with full band and chorus, the principal vocalists being Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. John Bridson; and the third will consist either of a high class miscellaneous programme or of some choral work of interest. In addition to those named above, the following artists are engaged: Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Damian, and Mr. Lucas Williams (vocalists); Mr. Carodus (solo violin), and Dr. William Rea (solo pianoforte).

We have been requested to publish the following. This decision is most important for piano-dealers who send out their goods on this system:—"Birmingham Police Court, September 14, 1886.—The Pianoforte Case.—Dale, Forty and Co., of Cheltenham, re Brawn. Before Mr. Kinnersley, stipendiary magistrate. This was an application by Mr. C. J. Chesshyre, of Cheltenham, solicitor, on behalf of Messrs. Dale, Forty and Co., for an order of restitution of the piano (for the stealing of which the prisoner Brawn had been convicted), under the 24th and 25th Victoria, c. 96, sec. 100, which piano was, before conviction, bona fide purchased by one Stephen Ainge, of Birmingham. Mr. Hebbert, jun., appeared for Mr. Ainge. Order to restore the piano to Messrs. Dale, Forty and Co. was at once made by the learned magistrate."

The prospectus of the Sacred Harmonic Society announces that five Concerts will be given during the coming season as follows: December 3, "Judas Maccabæus," December 17, "The Messiah," January 21, 1887, "Elijah," February 25, Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," and March 25, Costa's "Eli." Engagements have already been made with many of the most eminent solo vocalists. Mr. W. H. Cummings retains the post of Conductor, and Mr. Fountain Meen is Organist. The council in the prospectus make an earnest appeal to all friends of the Society to use their utmost endeavours to extend the number of subscribers, and draw attention to the fact that in reducing the number of Concerts to five they have considered what they feel to be the best interests of the Society.

THE Highbury Philharmonic Society promises for the ensuing season four Concerts, the first of which will take place on November 29, when "Judas Maccabæus" will be given. At the second Concert, on January 31, 1887, Randegger's "Fridolin" and a miscellaneous selection. On March 21, Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, Bach's "I wrestle and pray," Beethoven's "A calm sea and a prosperous voyage," and a selection from "William Tell." At the last Concert, on May 16, Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night." Dr. Bridge having, much to the regret of the Society, resigned the post of Conductor, which he has so long and so efficiently held, has been succeeded by Mr. Gilbert H. Betjemann, who will be assisted by Mr. David Beardwell.

THE 175th monthly Concert of the Grosvenor Choral Society was held at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road, on Friday, the 17th ult., when a highly interesting programme of miscellaneous music was given. The soloists were Miss Meredith Elliott, Mrs. Woodhouse, Miss Gibbs, Miss Kelly, Mr. T. F. Davies, Mr. L. Frederick, and Mr. A. J. Reynolds. Amongst the part music was Schumann's Cantata "Gipsy Life" and Callcott's "Hark! hark! pretty lark!" Mr. A. Wood presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

THE Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held at St. Mary's, Horney Rise, on Friday, the 17th ult., the congregation being the largest ever known. The anthems were "Fear not, O land" (Goss) and Mozart's "Gloria" (12th Mass); and suitable voluntaries were played by the Organist, Mr. W. G. Wood.

MR. T. TALLIS TRIMMELL, who has for many years occupied a prominent position in musical circles in Sheffield, sailed, on the 23rd ult., for Auckland, N.Z., in which city he has decided to reside for the future.

THE Bach Choir will give three Concerts during the ensuing season, the programmes promising some interesting features. The first Concert, on December 14, at Prince's Hall, will be without orchestra, and will include Motets by Felice Anerio, M. Prætorius, and Chr. Bach. The second, on March 8, 1887, at St. James's Hall, will comprise Bach's Cantata "Hold in remembrance," Beethoven's Violin Concerto (played by Herr Joachim), and a selection from Schumann's Opera "Genoveva" (for the first time in England). For the third and last Concert, on May 17, Bach's Suite in D, a new work by Dr. C. H. Parry, and Berlioz's Te Deum will be the principal features. Dr. C. Villiers Stanford will resume his post as Conductor.

THE Harvest Festival was held at Christ Church, Charlton Street, N.W., on Friday, the 24th ult. The church, which had been very appropriately decorated, was filled by an attentive congregation. The service was fully choral, including Bunnett's Evening Service in F, the anthem being Sydenham's "Great is the Lord." The choir was under the direction of Mr. G. S. Smith. After the service the Organist, Mr. Albert Wood, gave a suitable selection upon the organ. The service was repeated on Sunday with slight alteration.

MR. HENRY WRIGHT (late of the Sacred Harmonic Society) announces a Vocal and Instrumental Concert, to take place at Neumeys Hall, on the 4th inst. The vocalists will be Misses M. Hoare and Buckland, and Messrs. Iver McKay, Kift, Sackville Evans, and Chaplin Henry; instrumentalists, Messrs. G. Horton, Clinton, Wotton, Naldrett, and W. H. Thomas. Recitations will be contributed by Mr. Fry. The Concert is under the patronage of Mr. A. Manns.

THE prospectus of the North-East London Choral Society, Morley Hall, Hackney, under the presidency of Ebenezer Prout, Esq., B.A., announces three Concerts, at the first of which, in December, Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and Handel's "Acis and Galatea" will be given; at the second, in March, 1887, Mr. C. H. Lloyd's new Cantata "Andromeda," and a miscellaneous selection; and at the third, in May, a new work by L. B. Prout, Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, and Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen"; Conductor, Mr. John E. West, F.C.O.

A SERIES of weekly Organ Recitals has been instituted at St. John's, Waterloo Road, on Tuesday evenings, those during the past month having been given by Mr. Henry J. B. Dart. All the Recitals have been largely attended, and the programmes have included compositions by Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Beethoven, Rubinstein, Guilmant, Smart, Hopkins, and Stainer. It is contemplated to continue these Recitals through the winter months, in the course of which many eminent London organists will perform.

THE prospectus of the Tufnell Park Choral Society for its fifteenth season announces that the following works will be put in rehearsal: Mendelssohn's "Christus," Corder's Cantata "The Bridal of Triermain," Dvorák's Oratorio "Saint Ludmila," and Sir A. Sullivan's Cantata "The Golden Legend." The rehearsals will commence on the 12th inst., and the first Concert will take place on December 14. Mr. W. Henry Thomas continues to hold the post of Conductor, which he has so long and ably filled.

THE Conductorship of the Tottenham Orchestral Society has been accepted by Messrs. R. J. Pitt and George F. Grover, who have started a Choral Society in connection with the same, which, for the future, will be known as the Tottenham Orchestral and Choral Society. The Committee is most sanguine of success with this new departure in so popular a suburb.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were held in Christ Church, North Finchley, on Sunday, the 19th ult. The anthem at each service was "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works" (Barney). The sermons were preached by the Vicar, the Rev. H. Stephens. Mr. C. Vere, the Organist, presided at the organ.

WE are informed that Miss Agnes Zimmermann intends leaving London immediately for a few weeks, that she will play at the Gewandhaus Concerts, Leipzig, on November 11, and return to London shortly after that date.

MR. G. ERNEST LAKE, Organist and Musical Director of All Saints' Church, Kensington, has been presented by the churchwardens and gentlemen of the choir with a handsome service of Wedgwood china, upon the occasion of his marriage. The presentation was made by Mr. Barker, head master of St. Alphege's Choir School, in the unavoidable absence of the Vicar, the Rev. Canon Trench.

THE Clapham Amateur Orchestral Society announces four Subscription Concerts for the twelfth season at Clapham Hall, the date of the first being November 26. At the general meeting, held on the 20th ult., it was announced that a balance remained in hand after paying all expenses. Mr. Ammon Winterbottom is the hon. Conductor.

THE twenty-ninth season of the Monday Popular Concerts is announced to begin on November 1, and will continue, with a short interval at Christmas, to April 4, 1887. The Saturday Concerts will extend from November 6 to April 2.

No fewer than 1,500 students have entered the School of Music connected with the Birmingham and Midland Institute. There are classes in all branches of the art, including orchestral instruments, the fee for elementary study of the violin being as low as one penny per lesson.

A FESTIVAL will be held at St. Augustine and St. Faith's Church, Old Change, E.C., on the evening of St. Faith's Day at 7.30. Evensong, which will be fully choral, will be followed by Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus."

THE St. Peter's Choral Society, Brockley, will commence its second season, under the conductorship of Dr. C. J. Frost, on Tuesday, the 5th inst., when Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" will be put in rehearsal.

REVIEWS.

Rainbow Musick. By Lady Archibald Campbell.
[Bernard Quaritch.]

THIS short pamphlet of thirty-four pages, devoted to the discussion of "harmony in room-decoration," exhibits within its narrow compass the furthest possible divorce of sense from sound, of words from worth, of which "a person of quality" may be deemed capable who is possessed of a considerable command of fantastic phraseology and an imperfect appreciation of the proper use of philosophical terms. There is a sentence on p. 5 which seems to us admirably to describe the general character of this brochure. The author is really speaking of modern room-decoration and its shortcomings, which she sums up finally as "confusion everywhere, a jumble in which we may seek in vain the dénouement! for theme, or plot, there is none." The rainbow comes in for a much larger share of notice than music, or musick as it is spelt on the cover, which fortunately limits the task of the critic to the consideration to those few pages which are devoted to an enthusiastic account of the various projectors who strove to give practical shape to observed "sentic (sic) correlations of colour and sound." The first of these whom she discusses in detail was the Jesuit Father, Castel (born at Montpelier in 1688), who published, in 1725, his theory of the ocular harpsichord, based on Newton's discovery "that the breadths of the seven primary colours, produced by the refraction of the sun's rays through a prism, are proportional to the seven differences of the lengths of the eight musical strings." Castel's harpsichord was described by its designer as "an instrument to play upon, analogous to the auricular organ, composed of as many octaves of colour by tones and half-tones, destined to give to the mind, by the eyes, the same agreeable sensations of melody and harmony of colour as those of melody and harmony of sound which the ordinary harpsichord communicates to the ear." The learned Jesuit, however, never perfected his instrument, though it was "theoretically ingenious to a degree," and Lady Archibald Campbell passes on to speak of the treatise on "Colour Music" of a Mr. D. D. Jamieson, published in 1844. This author accounted for the failure of Castel's method on the two following grounds, which we recommend to the careful consideration of our readers:—"1. The spaces of the colours were not commensurate to the time of the notes,

2. It was found impossible, by any practicable extension of inherent colours, to produce a sentic effect equivalent to that of aural music." But Mr. Jamieson claimed to have obviated both these difficulties by his own "mode of illustration." Mr. Jamieson's instrument, as described in his own inimitable style, is strangely suggestive of the dark room of a photographer's studio, fitted up with the glass bottles which stand in a chemist's window, the colours of which are "evolved" singly or in combination by the percussion of the keys of a pianoforte. This and another colour-organ of American origin—melancholy instances of the distorted ingenuity of the human intellect—provoked Lady Archibald Campbell to further speculations on "Colour-audition" and kindred topics. Finally, for the benefit of those whose "soul-feeling is stirred by Nature's harmonies," Lady Archibald Campbell publishes a setting of some words of Tennyson's in a key which she incorrectly gives as B minor, and which we take to be a specimen of rainbow music. This composition is not otherwise remarkable. As to the convertibility of the sensations of colour and sound, and the desirability of combining them through the medium of some instrument, we may be allowed to remark that there is a pretty general consensus of opinion amongst competent critics that a great deal of the charm of music resides in its invisibility, and that the incoherent and rambling rhapsodies of the author of "Rainbow Musick" are about as likely to shake this conclusion as a popgun is calculated to make an impression on the Great Pyramid.

Catholic Hymns, with accompanying tunes. Edited by A. E. Tozer. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

ALTHOUGH hymnology is a branch of sacred art specially appertaining to Protestant forms of worship, it must not be forgotten that many of the most familiar hymns now sung in church, if not in chapel, are adaptations of lyrics by Roman Catholic writers, and in the work before us they reappear in their original form, or at any rate in translations more literal than those to which we are accustomed. Beside the direct appeals to the Virgin and the Saints, which of course are not permissible in the Church of England, these hymns abound in glowing imagery, and are pervaded by a spirit of sensuous realism which would certainly give offence to the average Protestant mind. But other ideas prevail with our brethren of the Church of Rome, and Mr. Tozer's collection of hymns ought to receive a cordial welcome from them. It consists of eighty lyrics of which all, save seven, are in English. Among the tunes are a number of fine modern examples reprinted from the Hymnary and other collections, and a large proportion of new tunes written expressly for the work, among the composers' names being those of Mr. C. Harford Lloyd, Dr. E. M. Lott, Mr. G. F. Cobb, Dr. A. H. Mann, Mr. Luard Selby, and others of equal rank. The average merit of these is very high, and we have not discovered one example unworthy of its place. The book may be warmly commended to the notice of those for whom it is intended.

Original Compositions for the Organ. No. 54.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THERE would be no great rashness in predicting that the present number of this publication will be one of the most generally popular of the series. It contains a remarkably pleasing Postlude in B flat, by John E. West, written in minuet form and measure, but sufficiently dignified for church use. The middle section, or Trio, is especially melodious and charming, and the comparative simplicity of the piece is not the least important point in its favour.

An Autumn Song. Words by Arthur Platt.

Versailles. A Song in Minuet form.

Composed by Gerard F. Cobb.

[London Music Publishing and General Agency Company.]

THESE songs are so much alike in character—both having flowing accompaniments, in two and three parts, against simple themes in triple time—that we cannot but fear that their composer may fall into a mannerism unless he turn his undoubted talents into another direction. The song in "minuet form" is, we think, the better of the two, but artistic feeling and musicianlike treatment are quite as apparent in the "Autumn Song," which is a very fair setting of some exceedingly musical verses.

Stabat Mater Dolorosa. Set to music by William H. Hunt, Mus. Doc., London. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

APART from all question of musical merit, this work is interesting as being the exercise of the first successful candidate for the degree of Mus. Doc. at the London University. It has been published by subscription, among the list of 250 names being those of the principal officials of the University. The general idea of a degree exercise is that of a work in which all individuality of expression is sacrificed to the stern necessity of observing established rules, and we can imagine the composer of this "Stabat Mater" being called upon by examiners of the old school to name his authorities for many of the striking progressions to be found in various parts of the score. Not that there is any lack of mere science; on the contrary, every one of the twelve movements shows the hand of the scholar, and the final eight-part fugue is all that can be desired as a proof of its composer's mastery of counterpoint. It is in the earlier movements, however, that we discover the most decisive traces of independent thought. This shows itself in certain very bold sequential transitions of key rather than in mere freshness of theme. It was almost inevitable that a setting of the "Stabat Mater" should betray the influence of Dvořák, whose sublime music has exercised so much fascination over musicians, and we find it in this instance in the strong rhythmical swing of the subjects. A salient example will be found in the duet for soprano and bass, "Fac me cruce," which recalls the Bohemian composer's "Eia Mater," though there is no actual plagiarism. It is difficult to judge of the true effect of a work from merely reading the vocal score, but it would be strange indeed if Dr. Hunt's "Stabat Mater" did not repay the attention of choral societies, and we hope to hear it performed in London.

The Arrow and the Song. Words by Longfellow. Music by Ch. Gounod. [Metzler and Co.]

LONGFELLOW's well known verses have here received a most sympathetic setting, and one which, in spite of the many which have preceded it, will doubtless attract the attention of our best vocalists. The semiquaver accompaniment, which runs throughout the song, with a rarely interrupted succession of legato crotchets for the left hand, is highly effective, and the harmonies are in admirable keeping with the feeling of the words. Amongst the many salient points in the composition, we may especially mention the enharmonic modulation on the phrase "I breath'd a song," which is most happily suggestive of the poetry.

Three Idylls. For Violin, or Violoncello and Pianoforte. By Charles W. Pearce, Mus. Doc. [Weekes and Co.]

MUSIC for violin and pianoforte is now in great request, and Dr. Pearce's efforts to meet the demand are not likely to be received with chilling indifference. Nevertheless his characteristic pieces are not all equal in merit. The first is vague and discursive, with a sense of striving after an effect which never comes. The next, on the other hand, is bright and charmingly unsophisticated; and the third, though more ambitious, is very well written for both instruments. The descriptive titles might surely have been dispensed with. A first-rate musician need not borrow the stock-in-trade of the charlatan.

Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Pianoforte Albums. Nos. 17, 18, and 19. Compositions by Fritz Spindler. Edited by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE publication of these Pianoforte Albums offers a tempting opportunity for amateurs to form an excellent library of music of varied character at a very small outlay. A glance at the contents of the numbers which have preceded those before us will show that the compositions selected, although of a nature appealing to the popular taste, have always been chosen with the view of elevating that taste; and there can be little doubt that the three Albums now issued, devoted exclusively to the works of Fritz Spindler, will be most cordially welcomed. Those who know the charming and graceful pieces of this composer will be glad to find all their old friends in these numbers; but strangers to them may be told that those named "Murmuring Rivulet," "Butterfly," "Verbene," "Mon Petit Ange," and "Columbine," in No. 17; "Primrose," "The Forest Hermitage," "Heartsease," and "Valse Aérienne," in No. 18; and "Un Conte de Fées," "Dahlia," "Valse Mélodieuse," and "Autumn Leaves," in No. 19, can be selected as very fair specimens of the style of the composer—although when these have been played listeners will be certain to wish to hear all the rest. It should also be mentioned that each number contains an excellent Transcription from one of Wagner's Operas—No. 17, "The Pilgrim's Chorus" from "Tannhäuser"; No. 18, "The Evening Star" from the same Opera; and No. 19, "The Spinning Song" from "The Flying Dutchman."

Ora pro nobis (Pray for us). Song. Words by A. Horspool. Music by M. Piccolomini.

[Orsborn and Tuckwood.]

WE are glad that this composition is not included amongst the "Songs that captivate the Universe," a list of which is placed by the publishers on the title-page, because it might seem presumptuous to dissent from so widely expressed an opinion. An orphan child who, although "banned by the hoot of the churlish owl," steals into a church on a stormy night, and afterwards dies in the street, is too old-world a tale to inspire interest save by some freshness in the music, and this M. Piccolomini has failed to impart.

The Office of the Holy Eucharist in D, by John Storer, Mus. Doc.; Communion Service in E flat, by W. H. Higgins. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

DR. STORER's Communion Service is obviously intended for churches in which full ritual prevails, and it may be commended in general terms, though it has no distinctive character. The best section is the Gloria in excelsis, which is very spirited and energetic. We think that the composer has not well considered his metronome marks. Sung at the pace indicated, some of the passages would be nothing more than an irreverent scramble. The setting of Mr. Higgins is, on the whole, more attractive, and more modern in melody and harmony. All the sections are brief, but the composer has managed to introduce many strikingly effective passages. His service has all the elements necessary to secure general approval.

So she went drifting. Song. Words by Walter C. Smith. Music by Ethel M. Boyce.

[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THIS is really a charming song. The words tell a simple tale in simple words, and the music throughout is most sympathetic with the text. The several changes in the character of the accompaniment show that the composer has well thought out her task, and introduced nothing for mere effect; one good point amongst the many in this composition being the lazy pianoforte part to the phrase "So she went drifting," on each occasion of its frequent occurrence. We shall be glad again to meet with Miss Boyce.

The Cavalier. Song for Baritone. Written by Constance Lacy. Composed by Stephen Kemp. [London Music Publishing Company.]

BARITONE singers (who are by no means well supplied with modern songs) will, we are certain, welcome this spirited and artistic composition, which is thoroughly vocal, and contains much dramatic feeling. Miss Lacy tells us an exciting little story in her excellent verses; and Mr. Kemp has coloured them in a kindred spirit. The accompaniments throughout are such as only an accomplished musician could write.

Songs for Little Singers. A collection of Sacred and Secular Songs for Little Folks. By George Fox. [Edinburgh: Paterson and Sons.]

A QUOTATION from the Scriptures stands at the head of each song in this collection as a text upon which the verses are written. The original music supplied to all these by Mr. Fox is most appropriate, both in the voice part and accompaniment. From the twenty songs in the book we may especially mention "Little drops of water," "The Lord my pasture shall prepare," "Little bird, little bird," "Let dogs delight to bark and bite," and "From Greenland's icy mountains," as worthy of much praise.

Songs. Composed by L. Van Beethoven. Vol. I. The English version by the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

No more effectual protest against the meretricious vocal works of the day can be devised than the publication, in a cheap form, of this volume of songs. We should, of course, not think of enlarging upon the exceptional beauties of such compositions as "Adelaide," "A Song of Penitence," "A Song of May," "Mignon's song," "Hope," and many others contained in the book before us were we only appealing to musicians; but amateurs—even those who profess a real love for the art—as a rule, know but little of the rich legacy bequeathed to them by the great writers; and we are certain, therefore, that they will thank us for directing their attention to the songs of one who, like Shakespeare, has written "for all time." We may also say that the English version is not only an excellent translation, but truly sympathetic with the music.

I cried unto God. A Sacred Cantata. By John William Jackson. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE words of this brief Cantata are taken from the seventy-seventh and the hundredth Psalms, Bible version. It consists of nine numbers, of which the final fugue is the most important. In this the composer displays some fairly good musicianship; but, speaking generally, his writing is rather feeble and colourless. The music flows on smoothly enough and gives no offence, though it is expressive of nothing in particular. Mr. Jackson is not to blame for this, as individuality is a gift, and those who have it not can only make up for its want by industry and learning. This Cantata is dedicated to the Macclesfield Philharmonic Society; by whom it will be performed on the 19th inst.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE Bayreuth Festival performances, as has now been definitely decided upon, will be resumed in 1888, when, in addition to "Parsifal" and "Tristan und Isolde," that most charming, and likewise most truly popular production of Wagner's genius, "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," is to be included in the model representations of the master's music dramas. The necessary guarantee fund has, it is said, already been subscribed for, among the contributors being several French admirers of the reformer's works. Thus, the perpetuation of an altogether unique undertaking would seem to be financially assured for the present, while the difficulties attendant upon an annual re-assembling in the small Bavarian town of the élite of German executive artists, together with the special preparations necessary for the mounting of so elaborate a work as "Die Meistersinger," sufficiently account for the decision on the part of the committee of the "Festspiele" to postpone their resumption over next year. It is stated, that notwithstanding the greatly increased expenses, the recent Bayreuth performances have yielded a clear profit of some 15,000 marks; a result signifying an increase on the average attendance at the Festspielhaus which is largely owing to the steadily growing appreciation of Wagner's works on the part of music-lovers of all nationalities, and especially of France. We have referred before now to the propaganda for Wagner which is being actively, though of late not very noisily, carried on in the French capital, and, notwithstanding the numerous opponents, on "patriotic" grounds, to the movement, there are many signs that the works of the German master will find, ere long, a home on the French stage, and will be at least as much appreciated in this, their proper sphere, as they already are in the concert-rooms of that country. Whether M. Lamoureux, the zealous exponent, in concert-form, of Wagner's music in Paris will be the first to lead the way in the above direction appears as yet uncertain, his scheme of producing "Lohengrin" and "Die Walküre" during the coming winter at the Eden Theatre having, it is rumoured, been abandoned for the present. In the poet-composer's native country, on the other hand, his music-dramas continue to be by far the most attractive in the répertoires of operatic stages. Even the gigantic "Nibelungen" Tetralogy forms no exception to this experience, the recent twice repeated performance of which at the Dresden Hof-Theater, before crowded audiences, created the utmost enthusiasm. At the Berlin Opera, the concluding part of the same work, "Götterdämmerung," is to be produced during the present season, "Siegfried" having been brought out here last year, while the performance of the entire Tetralogy—already repeatedly accomplished by the majority of the leading lyrical establishments of the fatherland—still awaits its realisation on the foremost operatic stage of its capital.

Richard Wagner's widow, Frau Cosima, has presented a set of jewellery to Frau Materna and a valuable goblet to Herr Winkelmann, in recognition of the services rendered by these artists at the recent Bayreuth performances, and for which they had accepted no pecuniary remuneration.

The Berlin Opera re-opened its doors on August 26, with a performance of Wagner's "Lohengrin." Heinrich Hofmann's new operatic work "Donna Diana," to be brought out during this month, will be the first novelty of the season.

Some interesting details are stated in German papers relative to the origin of the Spanish National Hymn, the composer of which, it appears, is no other than Frederick the Great, the warrior-king of Prussia. It was after a gala reception at Berlin, so the story goes, that the versatile monarch, in a jocular way, presented to the Spanish ambassador a manuscript composition of his own—a military march. The diplomatist, feeling flattered, and desirous of pleasing his majesty in return, at once forwarded the document to Madrid, where it was engraved, and shortly after executed by all the military bands. Here the complimentary part of the transaction ended; not so, however, the historical record of the royal composition, which became rapidly popular with the Castilians, and under the name of "Marcha Real" remains the representative National Hymn of Spain to this day. Some two decades ago, indeed, Marshal Serrano opened a competition for the composition of a marcha nacional. Five hundred musicians sent in their manuscripts, but not one of them was found worthy of being awarded the prize, and thus the musical talents of the royal amateur of Prussia remain conspicuously en evidence in the southern peninsula.

While on the subject of national hymns, we may quote the following interesting narrative, quoted in the Pall Mall Gazette from the Strassburger Post, anent the origin of the music wedded to verses representative of that newly resuscitated nation of whom we have heard so much lately—the Bulgarians:—"In the summer of 1876," says the journal in question, "during the exciting interval for the Balkan people between the Servian-Turkish and the Turkish-Russian wars, a German musician was employed at Adrianople in teaching a dozen Turkish recruits to play the horn. The place of instruction was the court of a half-ruined mosque in the valley between the Tundscha and Maritza. The heat was fearful; the Turkish recruits made such hideous sounds with their instruments that the German master was in despair, and declared that the Turks must be the most unmusical people in the world. He patiently repeated his lessons day after day, but his scholars made hardly any perceptible progress. In the intervals of his lessons he used to indulge himself with playing his own favourite melody—one much in vogue in Southern Germany—

Dein Wohl, mein Liebechen, trink ich in goldenem Wein, Könt'ich, ach, könt'ich, bei dir, du Holde, sein.

His musical longings to be near his fair one were heard and enjoyed by the Christian natives. He soon noticed that all the young Bulgarian lads were whistling and singing the German melody in the fields and lanes. The words, of course, they could neither catch nor understand. But the tune exactly fitted the metre of the new political and national song, "Dschumna Maritza"; and by some unknown person, or by a popular impulse, it was appropriated and acclimatised to the Slav verses."

The name of the composer of this German song is not mentioned in the above narrative, neither can we find the lines quoted in our copious collection of German Volkslieder. Perhaps one of our readers can furnish some information on this subject. The song in point probably is of comparatively modern production. The question is interesting enough in itself, and will become more so if, as it is to be hoped, the Bulgarians will be able to maintain and consolidate their separate national existence. Numerous pens have been employed from time to time in search of the true author of the music of our own National Anthem; while of late years the share with which Rouget de Lisle has long been credited in the composition of the stirring strains of the "Marseillaise," has been repeatedly, and not altogether unsuccessfully, disputed.

Active efforts are on foot in influential circles at Weimar for the removal there of the remains of Franz Liszt, whose genius has added fresh lustre to the classical associations of that town. Meanwhile, the apartments occupied by the master will, by order of the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar, be preserved in the same condition in which they were found after his death. Among his literary remains is said to be a "Pianoforte School," which will be edited by his biographer, Fraulein Lina Ramann, and the publication of which is, of course, eagerly anticipated.

A commemorative Concert, in honour of Franz Liszt, was given, on the 9th ult., at the Church of St. Paul, by the Leipzig Liszt-Society, when the following compositions by the lamented master were performed—viz., Requiem, for male voices, with organ accompaniment; "Angelus," for string quartet; 23rd Psalm, for tenor solo, harp, and organ; and the Organ Fugue on the name of "Bach."

A grand Liszt-commemoration is to take place, on the 17th inst., at Berlin, with the co-operation of the Philharmonic Orchestra, under direction of Herr Carl Klindworth. The proceeds are to be handed over to the "Liszt Fund," initiated by the Grand Duke of Weimar.

Anton Rubinstein's recently completed sixth Symphony, which is to be first publicly produced at the Leipzig Gewandhaus, was performed at a private Concert in St. Petersburg a short time ago, where it was greatly admired. The new work is said to be full of vigour and originality, and to present a most grateful task to the instrumentalists. The pianist-composer is about to leave the Russian capital for Prague, where he will superintend the final rehearsals of his opera "Ferramors," and conduct its first performance.

A pianoforte virtuoso nine years of age, Josef Hofmann, a native of Warsaw, has attracted some attention in German musical circles during this summer.

Dr. Hans von Bülow will give a series of four Concerts devoted to Beethoven's pianoforte works, arranged in chronological order, in the leading German towns during the winter season.

Mr. Goring Thomas's opera "Esmeralda," having met with so favourable a reception last year both at Hamburg and Cologne, the same composer's "Nadeshda" has been accepted at the Stadt-Theater of the latter town for performance during the coming winter.

We have received the annual report of the Dresden Conservatorium, from which we gather that during the past academical year that institution has been attended by 790 pupils. Amongst the list of professors figure the well-known names of Theodor Kirchner and Felix Dräseke.

Several of Sir Herbert Oakeley's compositions have recently been performed by the orchestra of the Kurcapelle at Ragatz (Switzerland), amongst them the Festival March "Edinburgh" and several of his Chorals, including that composed for Her Majesty's recent visit to the International Exhibition at Edinburgh.

A romantic opera, constructed upon the old operatic lines, and entitled "Ramiro," has been most favourably received at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater on its recent first performance. The composer, Herr Eugen Lindner, is as yet unknown to fame, the present being his first operatic production.

Herr August Kindermann, the veteran German singer, has just celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his connection with the operatic stage. Kindermann has been a member of the Munich Hof-Theater for forty years, during which period he has sung 2,990 times in operas.

Another opera having the Spanish national hero, the "Cid," for its subject, and composed by Herr W. Bohme, is to be brought out next month at the Hof-Theater of Dessau.

The Imperial Opera of Vienna is actively preparing a cycle of performances of Weber's operas, in celebration of the centenary of that genial composer's birth, in December next, comprising his four principal operatic works—viz., "Abu Hassan," "Freischütz," "Euryanthe," and "Oberon."

Herr Goldmarck's new opera, "Merlin," will be first produced in January next at the Vienna Hof-Theater; Herr Winkelmann, the eminent German tenor, having been chosen to create the part of the famous sorcerer and prophet.

Herr Franz Von Suppé has completed a new operetta entitled "Joseph Haydn," which is to be produced at the Josephstadt-Theater of Vienna on the occasion of the forthcoming unveiling, in the Austrian capital, of the statue of that composer.

M. Massenet's opera "Le Cid" will be one of the principal novelties of the season at the Frankfurt Stadt-Theater, where also M. Joncières's "Le Chevalier Jean" is shortly to be produced.

At the Paris Grand Opéra, Weber's "Der Freischütz" is just now being remounted with much care. A newly engaged soprano, Mdlle. Sarrailh, has been cast for the part of Aennchen, in which she will make her début at that establishment, the rôles of Agathe and of Max having been assigned to Madame Caron and M. Sellier respectively. It is said that M. Benjamin Godard is engaged upon an Opera, "Ruy Blas," founded upon Victor Hugo's drama, which will be brought out at the same establishment later in the season.

It is stated, in Italian journals, that the directors of the Paris Opéra have applied to Verdi for the composition of an opera, to be produced during the projected Exhibition in 1889, and the subject of which should have some bearing upon the centenary of the great revolution. The Maestro, whose new Opera "Iago" (or "Othello") still awaits its first performance, has, however, declined the task.

The Paris Conservatoire will, it is said, before long undergo a complete reorganisation.

The opera "Flora Mirabilis," by the young Maestro, Signor Samara, successfully brought out some time since at Milan, has just been produced with equal success at the Teatro Argentina of Rome. La Riforma, in summing up an article on the performance in question, says: "Here is a work which should be heard, and heard again, written by a Maestro who, unknown but yesterday, is well-known to-day, and will probably be famous to-morrow."

A young Italian composer, Signor Pizzia, a pupil of the late Amilcare Ponchielli, has written an opera entitled "Guglielmo Radcliffe," the libretto of which is founded upon Heine's drama, which has already served as the subject for an opera composed by the Russian musician, César Cui.

Glinka's Opera "Rousslane et Ludmilla" was recently revived with much success at the Marie Theatre of St. Petersburg.

A new, critically revised pianoforte score edition of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" is to be published by Messrs. Gutmann, of Vienna, as a worthy commemoration of the centenary of the first production of that immortal masterpiece next year. The arrangement of the score has been placed in the hands of the Viennese capellmeister, Herr J. N. Fuchs, and the German version of Da Ponte's words will be that by Herr Max Kalbeck, which has obtained the sanction of several of the leading German operatic stages. The net profits resulting from this interesting publication are to be devoted to the projected Mozart monument to be erected in the Austrian capital.

A "Method of Pianoforte Instruction," from the pen of the eminent Berlin pianoforte pedagogue, Professor Emil Breslau, is about to be published by the firm of Simrock, of Berlin.

Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig, have just published a small volume entitled "Friedrich Kuhlau," in commemoration of the centenary of the birth of that once popular composer of pianoforte music, and of several operas (amongst them a "William Shakespeare") the most successful of which, "Die Räuberburg," has, however, like the rest, been long since forgotten.

A statue has just been erected to Amilcare Ponchielli, at his native Paderno Cremonese.

A monument was unveiled last month, at Dresden, to Julius Otto, the composer of numerous popular four-part songs, and for many years cantor at the Kreuz-Gymnasium of that town. Otto died in the year 1877.

At Paris, died on the 6th ult., at the age of seventy-seven, Stéphane Louis Nicou-Choron, a composer of church music much esteemed in France.

Belgian papers announce the death of Etienne Ledent, a professor of the pianoforte at the Liège Conservatoire, and the composer of some charming pieces for his instrument.

The death is also announced, at Berlin, of Professor Hugo Schwartz, the director of a musical conservatorium in that capital.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FRANZ LISZT.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you kindly grant me a little space for a few remarks respecting my article on Liszt in last month's MUSICAL TIMES? When writing the article in question I was withheld by the fear of seeming impertinent from concluding the portion dealing with the difficult and necessarily briefly-discussed subject of Liszt as a composer with a request to the reader—namely, that he should not allow his partiality for, or antipathy to, the master to wrest my words into a meaning not intended by me. What I dreaded has come to pass; for not only do I find that extremists are displeased because they miss in my criticism the absolute laudation or abuse which alone can satisfy them, but that to the qualifications of my praise and blame an interpretation is given which I did not at all contemplate. However, I have no intention to restate my opinion, knowing well that even the most exhaustive disquisition, couched in the most precise language, is no security against misunderstandings of this kind. The open question of Liszt's position as a composer can, indeed, only be settled practically—i.e., by demonstration—æsthetic arguments and authoritative assertions are of no avail, nor, as a rule, of much value. Let once the prejudice be removed that Liszt was unvisited by inspiration, and destitute of the sense of beauty and form, and the battle will be won, and this king will soon come to his own. Now, to remove this prejudice nothing is needed but an acquaintance with Liszt's simpler compositions—with songs like "Das Veilchen," "Es muss ein Wunderbares sein," "Mignon's Lied," "Der du vom Himmel bist," "Die Lorelei," &c., with pianoforte pieces like the "Consolations," and many a number from the "Années de Pèlerinage," and with symphonic poems like "Les Préludes," "Orpheus," "Mazeppa," and "Die Ideale." And if the prejudice is once removed, I have no doubt that many other more exacting vocal and instrumental, choral and orchestral works, will be found palatable. As to the above-mentioned songs and pianoforte pieces, even the most classical of the classicists, unless he be at the same time an out and out pedant, cannot but admit their beauty. And though he may at first be taken aback by the divergence of forms in the symphonic poems, he must before long recognise, besides other excellences, their easy intelligibility. Several of Liszt's Rhapsodies have become great favourites with the public. If they are sometimes treated by critics de haut en bas, I think the view taken is a mistaken one. They ought not to be compared with Beethoven's symphonies and similar works. They are something very different, something sui generis, and something well worth having. Even were they nothing more than mere jeux d'esprit—and they are more—they would have a raison d'être. But enough of this.

A friend of mine has accused me of having made a scornful allusion to Berlioz, of having glorified Liszt at his expense. I am unable to see how this is borne out by my words. Certainly nothing was further from my mind than the intention of saying anything in disparagement of the great French master. I wished only to point out that, in my opinion, the totality of Liszt's works which are likely to live would turn out to be more valuable (considered quantitatively as well as qualitatively) than that of Berlioz's. I shall not quarrel with anyone whose calculation differs from mine. That I selected the long-neglected and only lately-appreciated French master for comparison can hardly surprise, seeing that his and his contemporary's fortunes as composers offer some points of resemblance. And the great number of diverse works composed by Liszt—Berlioz's are few and less diverse in kind—seems to me to justify my supposition.

In conclusion, I should like to correct a misprint which found its way into the tenth line of the second paragraph of my Liszt article, where, of course, "Eisenach" should be "Eisenstadt."

I am, Sir, yours truly,

FR. NIECKS.

DR. HANSLICK ON MUSIC IN ENGLAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

DEAR SIR,—Whilst agreeing with your correspondent's remarks concerning the onesidedness and recklessness of Dr. Hanslick in his criticism, I would like to ask him if he is not going a little too far when he says: "Dr. Hanslick knows perfectly well that the fashion in which the orchestral chief directs his forces matters no more, provided the results be satisfactory, than the colour of his whiskers or his tie. He may sit down or stand up, &c." I certainly think that a great deal depends upon the "fashion" of the conductor, if he desires a "satisfactory result." I certainly believe that a conductor, who is standing and is able to take his eyes from the score to watch his men, is more likely to achieve success, than one sitting down or rivetting his eyes on the music. Indeed, I think it quite necessary that a conductor should prompt and animate every instrument or set of instruments by his special notice, were it only to prevent mishaps. He should be in some way omnipresent; and this he can without going to the extreme of "wild gesticulation."

I have frequently had the pleasure of listening to the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig, one of the best in the world. As a matter of course, only good conductors have access to the bâton there, yet the difference of power and skill of these leaders was quite noticeable, and never did I hear more music brought out in the old house than when Brahms conducted. He seemed to be truly omnipresent, electrifying every player and plucking the very notes from each instrument. It is needless perhaps to say that if I have made the above remarks, it is without any reflection on Sir Arthur Sullivan or his confrère. Far be it from me.—I remain, dear Sir,

Yours respectfully,

CH. BEHR.

Southsea, September 11, 1886.

[Our correspondent's argument goes to show that "a great deal depends upon the 'fashion' of the conductor if he desires a 'satisfactory result.'" We never said anything to the contrary, but simply declared that, provided the result be satisfactory, the fashion matters nothing. Cannot our correspondent see the distinction?—ED. M. T.]

CONVERSION, INVERSION, REVERSION, RETROVERSION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I thank the reviewer for pointing out, on page 548, the passage in which he conceives that I "propose to call inversion conversion." I find that I make no such "proposal," but used conversion in a translation where he would prefer inversion, and where I should now prefer retroversion. Helmholtz says (page 498 of his fourth edition) that the mode of the minor sixth (in tempered notes C D^b E^b F G A B^b C') is the direct Umkehrung (turning about—(1) upside down, inversion; (2) right side left, reversion; (3) ascending and descending, retroversion) of the major mode. His meaning was that the ascending intervals of the first are the same as the descending intervals of the second, which is true for tempered, but not for just intonation, unless the grave second is used in descending. As this did not seem to be inversion, I used the logical term conversion. Thus, "all mortals are men" (false) is the conversion of the direct proposition, "all men are mortals" (true). I beg to disclaim any intention of calling musical inversion conversion. I still fail to see how my harmonic cell (a major and minor chord having the same prime and fifth) contains a true reversion, but do not wish to occupy space on that matter.

Yours truly,

ALEXANDER J. ELLIS.

TONIC SOL-FA MINOR SCALE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have read with interest Mr. Ellis's history of the Tonic Sol-fa Minor Scale, but do not understand the whole of it.

There is, I imagine, some inaccuracy in the notation given for E^b major, which makes the order of intervals T T S T t S T, instead of the acknowledged order T t S T t S; where T = $\frac{9}{8}$, t = $\frac{8}{9}$, S = $\frac{16}{15}$ equal 102, 97, and 56 respectively in the scale of 600 equal intervals to the octave.

If there is not another inaccuracy in the last paragraph, Mr. Ellis is, apparently, anxious to make us acquainted with the tonic major of the relative minor. If Mr. Ellis will kindly make the necessary corrections, or assure us that no correction is necessary, I will try again to realise his meaning.

The difficulty of "dislocation" of fifths on the "voice harmonium" may, I think, be met by the consideration that melodic progression requires no change of pitch on a holding note. Therefore, if the change of harmony indicated by E^b in this passage—were confirmed by subsequent progressions, the outer parts would adopt the necessary pitch by modifying their melodic intervals. On a pedal note, a "dislocation" might well take place at the confirmation of a harmonic change. It would be interesting to have other opinions on this subject.—Yours faithfully,

JOSEPH GOOLD.

MUSICAL DEGREES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have been told that it might be inferred from my communication on this subject in your August number that the University of London was the first to require a preliminary test of general culture. I did not intend to make any such claim, but, to prevent misunderstanding, I may state that Sir Robert Stewart informs me that this requirement was first introduced, at his instance, at the University of Dublin in 1862, since which date all the Musical Degrees given there have been preceded by such a test. Sir Robert also tells me that he long urged the advisability of the same measure on the English Universities, but it was not adopted by them till many years later.—Yours obediently,

WILLIAM POLE.

THE "MARSEILLAISE."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Concerning the subject of "The Marseillaise," I read the following in the June number of Cæcilia, the organ of the Alsatian Society of St. Cecilia (published at Colmar, Alsace), under the heading "Various" (I translate from the German:—"The melody of the 'Marseillaise.'") The Kölnische Volkszeitung writes: "Few of our readers are perhaps aware that the air of the 'Marseillaise' is of German origin. That it was the Credo of a Mass is maintained and proved by J. Scherr in his work 'Blucher, his life and times.' He says: 'The original copy of the Mass, which is one of Holtzmann's, bears the date 1776. It was discovered by Hamma in the musical library attached to the parish church of Mersburg. This discovery recalled to my mind an incident of my youth, which removed all my doubts on the matter. Many years ago, in the Catholic Church of a Suabian village, I sang, on Christmas night, a part in a composition, then performed for the first time. On leaving the church a friend of mine, an old soldier who had served in many of the revolutionary wars and had followed Napoleon from 1805 to 1814, said to me: 'Do you know what you have been singing?' The 'Marseillaise.' I knew it by the very first sound." This struck me very much, for the old soldier had often told me of the meaning which the 'Marseillaise' had had in its day. I therefore told the organist (who was my own father) all about it. 'The Marseillaise,' said he, 'why, the music to which I set our new hymn is a piece of an old Mass.' We ourselves have repeatedly heard from the vicinity of Lake Constance that the 'Marseillaise' was taken from one of Holtzmann's Masses, not, indeed, from the Credo, but from the Benedictus. Holtzmann's Masses were well known in the former diocese of Constance, but they are now almost entirely forgotten."

If your inquirer will prosecute the subject further, I think there is ample information in the above for him to do so.

Yours truly,

J. HEIN.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information, supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in not obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BOLTON.—There has been a complete dearth of Concerts and musical meetings during the summer. Now, however, there are signs of awakening. The Organ Recitals in the Town Hall have been resumed, and on the 11th ult., and again on the 18th, Mr. Mullineux, F.C.O., the borough organist, played before fair audiences. On the 15th ult. about thirty certificates, won by students and given by the authorities at Trinity College, London, were publicly distributed, under the direction of Mr. Filmeroff, F.C.O., &c.

BURNLEY.—After undergoing extensive repairs, the ancient Parish Church of St. Peter was re-opened at Evensong on the 1st ult. Special psalms and hymns were sung by the choir, under the direction of Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank, Mus. Bac., Organist of the church, and an impressive address was given by Canon Pigou, Vicar of Halifax.

—An interesting and instructive paper on Church Music was read by Mr. Charles Everson before a meeting of the Burnley Church Union on the 4th ult.—The new Assembly Rooms and Opera House were opened on the 14th ult. with a grand concert, Mlle. Trebelli and M. de Pachmann being the chief artists. The former received great applause for her rendering of Meyerbeer's aria "Omnia leggersia," and M. de Pachmann was heard to much advantage in pieces by Raff, Henselt, and Chopin. Solos and part-songs were well rendered by members of the Leeds and Scarborough Harmonic Society. Mr. Fred. Myers (Burnley) officiated as accompanist with his well-known ability. The choir, directed by Mr. E. S. Myers, has commenced rehearsals for the season with Mendelssohn's Elijah.

CANTERBURY.—An Organ Recital was given in the Cathedral by Dr. H. T. Pringuer, F.C.O., on the 15th ult. The programme included compositions by Bach, Merkel, Spohr, Guilman, Smart, and Bennett. Recitals were given on the 22nd and 29th ult. by Dr. A. L. Peace and Dr. Longhurst.

DEAL.—Two Organ Recitals were given in St. Andrew's Church, on the 1st ult., by Mr. W. H. Higgins, L.Mus., Organist of St. Margaret's, Canterbury. The programmes, which were well selected, included works from Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Lemmens, Mailly, Guilman, Batist, and Wely, the performance of which reflected much credit on Mr. Higgins. He was assisted in the vocal department by Miss Mary Beare, R.A.M., who gave an excellent rendering of several songs.

DUNSTER.—On Friday, the 3rd ult., Mr. Warriner, L.Mus., T.C.L., gave an Organ Recital at the Assembly Rooms, before a large audience. The programme included Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata, No. 2, Handel's Overture to Julius Cæsar, and Guilman's Grand March in D.—On Thursday, the 16th ult., the fifth Festival of the Dunster Choral Union was held in St. George's Church. About 200 voices rendered the service-music with much effect and precision. The Processional and Recessional Hymns were sung respectively to tunes composed by Tillard and Havergal, and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis to the well-known setting of J. B. Dykes in F. The anthem was Elvey's "Rejoice in the Lord." The Revs. W. Hook and H. A. Cockey intoned the Prayers; the sermon was preached by the Rev. W. P. Anderson, B.D., after which the Benediction was pronounced by the Rev. J. Utten Todd. Mr. Warriner, Organist of the Church, presided at the organ, and gave a short Recital after the Recessional.—On Friday, the 17th ult., Miss Janie Uppington, R.A.M., gave a pianoforte Recital at the Assembly Rooms. The programme was admirably selected and performed, and included excerpts from Bach, Beethoven ("Moonlight" Sonata), Mendelssohn, Chopin, and Liszt, and a Balade in G minor Moscheles ("Chromatic" Study), and Liszt's Fantasia on Wagner's Flying Dutchman.—On Sunday, the 19th ult., the annual Harvest Festival was held in Dunster Church. There were large congregations, and the musical portion of the service was well rendered by the choir. Mr. Warriner presided at the organ, and gave a short Recital after Evensong.

EASTBOURNE.—Two Organ Recitals were given in All Souls' Church by Mr. Henry Baillie, the Organist and Choirmaster, on August 31. Mr. Baillie played Lemmens's Fantasia "The Storm," Bridge's G minor Fugue, and works by Stephens, Bennett, Rossini, Bach, &c.

ENNISKILLEN.—Mr. Arnold's third Matinée Musicale and Tenth Evening Concert were given on the 13th ult., in the Protestant Hall, before large audiences. Miss Fannie Sellers sang with much effect several songs, which were warmly received. A string quartet, consisting of Captain Muntz, Master C. Haydn Arnold, Mr. Arnold, and Colonel Griffith, performed a Quartet in G specially composed for the Matinée by Captain Muntz. A piano Quartet (with Master Arnold at the piano) by Kalkbrenner was very much appreciated. Pianoforte solos were played by Master Arnold and Miss Usher, and Captain Muntz gave Papini's Gavotte on the violin. The trio for piano, tenor, and violin (Schumann) was well performed by Miss Usher, Mr. and Master Arnold. Miss Eunice Evans was encored in her violin solo. Songs were sung by Miss McKeague, Miss Lockneane, Messrs. W. C. Trimble, Myatt, and Whittle, and the church choir gave with good effect several part-songs. Mr. Matthew Arnold conducted.

FALMOUTH.—On the 18th ult., the annual meeting of the Royal Cornwall Polytechnic Society was brought to a close, when a very attractive concert was given. The principal feature was the appearance of Miss Anna Duckham, a child of twelve years, and a student at the Guildhall School of Music, who played violin solos, "Romance and Bolero" (Dancía), "Zigeunerweisen" (Sarasate), and Tarantelle (Dancía), and pianoforte solo, "Rondo Brillant" (Weber). The other artists were Miss F. Banks, Miss Carter, Mr. Bishop, Mr. C. Broad, and Mr. C. W. Robinson.

FARRINGTON GURNEY (BATH).—The organ in the Parish Church, after being repaired and enlarged by Mr. Vowles, of Bristol, was reopened on Saturday, the 4th ult., by Mr. F. Hodges (Organist of Queen Camel Church) with a Recital in the afternoon, and after Evensong on the following day.

Fiji.—On Friday, July 2, the Suva Dramatic and Operatic Society gave a very successful concert, which was attended by the Lieut.-Governor, the Hon. J. B. Thurston, accompanied by his daughter and his private secretary. Sterndale Bennett's May Queen was the chief performance of the evening, and the Society must be commended for its efforts in putting before the public a class of music, the appreciation of which becomes the more marked in proportion to the frequency with which it is presented. The following ladies and gentlemen did full justice to the parts respectively allotted to them:—Mesdames Hartenstein, Sturt, Farr, Collet, Forster, Misses Moore, Ambler, Robertson, Harness, E. Harness, and Walker, Rev. L. W. Renison, Messrs. G. Moore, Irvine, Forth, Baxendale, Fuller, L. E. Brown, Dufty, Smythe, F. Riemschneider, E. Moore, H. Stevenson, and Steele. The second part was miscellaneous, including vocal and instrumental selections. "Home, sweet Home" was most sweetly rendered (as an encore), by Mrs. Farr, and the evening closed with "God save the Queen," the solos by Miss Moore and Mr. H. Stevenson; Mr. H. G. H. White officiated at the piano with care and ability. Mr. Wilfred Collet directed the rehearsals, and conducted the May Queen, taking part also in the vocal music of the second part.

FOLKESTONE.—An evening Concert was given in the Town Hall, on Tuesday, the 21st ult., by Miss Margaret Gyde, A.R.A.M., assisted by the following artists:—Mlle. Marie de Lido, Madame Marian Mackenzie, Signor Riva, and Signor Giulio. The Marquis de Lenville recited two original poems, and Mr. H. C. Tonking conducted.

GAINSBURGH.—One of the most successful Concerts ever held here took place in the Temperance Hall on the 16th ult. The entertainment was promoted by the Rev. W. W. Robinson, and artists of high repute were engaged for the occasion. The programme was attractive and varied, and contained selections from the best masters. The following ladies and gentlemen took part in the entertainment:—Mrs. Mason, Miss Tallents, Mr. W. D. Foxon (silver medalist, R.A.M.), Mr. Arthur E. Godfrey, a gentleman who has gained distinction as a Composer; Dr. Wright, and Miss Winifred, Miss Kate, and Rev. W. W. Robinson, who all sang. Vocal solos were also given by Gainsburgh by justly proud. Miss Winifred Robinson created a marked success by her excellent violin-playing, especially in Mendelssohn's Concerto, the pianoforte playing of Mr. Godfrey was much admired, and all the vocal solos were warmly and most deservedly applauded.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, the 19th ult., at St. Joseph's Catholic Church, Mr. C. Hildesley and Miss Annie Harding (members of Mr. D'Oyly Carte's Opera Company) assisted in the choir. The former sang "Cujus Animam," and the latter (who is a pupil of Signor Randegger, and daughter of L. L. Harding, Esq., Organist of St. Mary's, Haverfordwest) Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer."

GLOSSOP.—On Sunday, August 29, a new organ from the factory of Messrs. Young and Sons, of Manchester, was opened at Ebenezer Chapel, by Mr. W. A. Young, whose selection of works displayed the fine qualities of the instrument to great advantage.

HUDDESFIELD.—An excellent Concert was given by the Glee and Madrigal Society at the Town Hall, on the 11th ult., before a large audience. The utmost taste and refinement were shown in the rendering of the excellent selection of part-music contained in the programme, the test pieces sung by the choir in the choral competition at the Liverpool Exhibition being especially well given, and producing a marked effect. Vocal solos were also successfully sung by Miss Gertrude Turner, Miss Emily Smyth, Miss E. England, Mr. Herbert Sandwell, Mr. W. Martin, and Messrs. H. and F. Haigh. Mr. North, who conducted the Concert in his usual admirable manner, was, during an interval in the programme, presented with a beautiful ivory báton, ornamented with gold, and bearing a suitable inscription, subscribed by the members in appreciation of his valuable services. The presentation was made by Alderman Woodhead, M.P., President of the Society, and suitably acknowledged by the recipient.

LUTON.—Since the opening of the organ at Christ Church, on Ascension Day, several Recitals have been given by eminent organists, all of which were much appreciated by a large number of people. The performers were Messrs. Haynes, F. Davostan, A.C.O., H. S. Trego, Mus. Bac, F.C.O., W. Carling, Mus. Bac, and F. Gatward; Mr. Lambert, Organist of the Church, bringing the series to a close on the 15th ult.

MURHEAD.—Mr. Warriner, L.Mus., T.C.L., &c., of Dunster, gave an Evening Concert at the Assembly Rooms, on Thursday, August 26, with the assistance of Miss Janie Uppington, R.A.M., and Mr. Fred. Winkley, A.C.O. (pupil of Mr. Warriner).

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—Rogers' Cantata, The Pilgrim's Progress, was given at Clarence Street Wesleyan Chapel, on the 15th ult., before a large audience. The choruses in this work are extremely effective, and they were excellently rendered by the choir, augmented for the occasion to seventy voices, the principal vocalists—Miss Lizzie Bell, Miss S. A. Stevenson, Mr. J. Thirlwall, and Mr. J. Robinson, joining giving the solos with much effect. Being a kind of harvest thanksgiving, the gallery was festooned, the pillars wreathed, and the pulpit tastefully ornamented with flowers.

NEWTOWN.—On the 10th ult. an excellent Concert was given in the Victoria Hall, in aid of the Crescent Chapel Building Fund. The principal vocalists were Miss Mary Owen, Miss Marion Price, Miss Annie Williams, Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys, and Mr. Lucas Williams, all of whom were highly appreciated. The programme comprised a selection of airs from well known oratorios, with miscellaneous songs, ballads, trios, and quartets. There was also some fine part singing by an effective choir of forty voices. Mr. G. H. Bell acted as accompanist throughout, and contributed several classical pianoforte solos, which were executed with marked ability. Mr. J. C. Gittins conducted.

PENZANCE.—Mr. J. H. Nunn gave an evening Concert at St. John's Hall, on the 8th ult., before a large audience. The principal vocalists were the Misses Henrietta and Gertrude Nunn and Mr. Sims Reeves. In the instrumental department Miss L. M. Nunn (violin) and Miss G. Nunn (violin) were highly successful. As an encore for "Tom Bowling," Mr. Sims Reeves substituted "My pretty Jane."

ROWINGTON (WARWICK).—An excellent Concert was given on Friday evening, the 3rd ult., on behalf of the choir. The vocalist was Mr. Frank May (Evill Prize Holder and Medalist of the R.A.M.), and Mr. Courtenay Woods, Organist of Solihull Parish Church, was solo pianist. Mr. May's songs, "I'm a Roamer" (Mendelssohn) and "The Raft" (Pinsuti), were warmly encored, and the skill and execution of Mr. Courtenay Woods were heard to much advantage in the Ballade in A flat (Chopin) and the Rondo in E flat (Weber). Several part-songs made up the programme, and were thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

SOUTHEAD.—Mr. C. J. C. Boddington, Organist of St. Saviour's Church, Stoke Newington, gave a second Organ Recital at the Wesleyan Chapel, Park Road, on August 31, in aid of the organ fund. The performance was excellent, and the audience most appreciative. The programme comprised selections from Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, Wely, Batiste, Braga, Mailley, and others.

TORQUAY.—Mr. Thos. Craddock, Mus. Bac, Oxon., gave an Organ Recital in St. Mary Magdalene Church, on August 30, when he was assisted by Miss Adelaide Clarke, who possesses a fine voice. The programme was well selected and much appreciated.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Reginald Steggall, A.C.O., to St. Anne's, Soho.—Mr. Charles E. Miller, to St. Bartholomew's, Lostwithal.—Mr. Oliver Edward Fleet Cobb, Organist and Choirmaster to the Church of St. Stephen, Canonbury, N.—Mr. James H. VOCAL SCORE. OLD NOTATION. TENTH THOUSAND

RUTH

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."— Bucks Herald.

"Ruth" is a work of sterling power: its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Braiford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Post.

"Ruth" has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice.
. . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

THE HOLY CITY

A SACRED CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"To show the great popularity of Mr. Gaul's Cantata, 'The Holy City,' it may be mentioned that the rendering at Saltley Mission Hall, on Friday last, was the fortieth in Birmingham and its immediate environs since its production."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

"The work is an honour to English art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The 'Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

(Composer of the "Holy City," "Ruth," &c.)

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, 'April,' and No. 5, 'May,' are our special favourites, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where sisters or friends delight in joining voices. The pianoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary pianist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

PROGRESSIVE SIGHT-SINGING, for the use of Singing-Classes, Choirmasters, &c. By ROBERT MACHARDY. An easy systematic course of instruction for teaching to read Music at Sight in a few lessons. A large reduction for quantities.

NEW WORK.

ARRANGEMENTS for the Organ. By W. J. WESTBROOK, Mus. Doc. This work has been designed to meet the wants of those Organists who have to play organs more or less incomplete. The whole of the pieces may be played, therefore, upon organs with two keyboards; many of them, by a little management, upon organs with only one. The pedal is, of course, indispensable. It has been the aim to make all the pieces thoroughly playable, and as easy as was consistent with their due effect.

This work is now being published by subscription, and will be clearly printed (with an independent stave for the pedals throughout) upon 250 full music size pages of the usual Organ oblong form.

The subscription may be for either part, or for all, as follows:—

- | | |
|---------------|-------------------------|
| Part 1 | 10s. 6d. net post-free. |
| Part 2 | 5s. 3d. net post-free. |

- | | |
|-------------------------------|------------------------|
| Or Parts 1, 2, and 3 together | 21s. net post-free. |

When the subscription list is closed the work will only be obtainable at the marked net price. The majority of the pieces will be of rather an easy nature, intricate combinations of the manual and pedal parts being plentifully given. This will make the 36 Short and Easy Voluntaries particularly useful to young students, and for teaching purposes, as the master will be spared considerable trouble in making guiding marks for a pupil, and the latter will be less likely to go astray when practising alone.

It is hoped that the 22 Postludes will supply an acknowledged want of a set of concluding voluntaries for divine service, that will not make unreasonable demands upon the player, and yet at the same time will be fairly solid and effective.

The whole work is mostly set for organs of two manuals; for though the third manual is not forgotten, it is borne in mind that most instruments in this country have two manuals only, and that while pieces written for two manuals can always be played upon one having three, those written for three cannot so easily be played upon two, for which indeed they require adaptation and re-arrangement, thus giving an Organist something else to manage in addition to the execution of the piece.

It is generally acknowledged that close printing makes the reading of music a more difficult task than when it is more clearly spread out. By allowing the music ample space upon the plates this is to be obviated.

Subscriptions or subscribers' names (quoting church appointment if any) should be at once sent to the Composer, BURLINGTON VILLA, UNDERHILL ROAD, LORDSHIP LANE, S.E., so as to be in time for the List of Subscribers which it is hoped to publish.

To those who send in their name only, a notice will be sent when the work is ready (about the end of October), and on the receipt of their remittance it will be posted to them.

P.O.O. payable at Honor Oak Post Office, Westhall Road, S.E.

THE MAID OF ASTOLAT

DEDICATED TO PROFESSOR SIR GEORGE A. MACFARREN,

Produced at the Wolverhampton Festival, September 16, 1886,

THE LIBRETTO WRITTEN BY DESMOND L. RYAN

COMPOSED BY

C. SWINNERTON HEAP.

Price 4s. net, in paper cover; in paper boards, 5s. net; bound in scarlet cloth, 6s. net.

Chorus parts, 1s. each net.

A PART FOR THE HARMONIUM, BY MR. WINDEYER CLARK, IS IN COURSE OF PREPARATION.

PRESS NOTICES.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

DAILY NEWS.

"Dr. Heap's composition is one of considerable excellence. . . . The lyrics are gracefully set, and the concerted music is of an interesting character. The first trio in the composition is especially noticeable as being one of the best numbers in a work which in various places displays much imagination. The chorus writing is good, and, considering the interest of the story which forms the plot, the new work should be a decided success."

STANDARD.

"An excellent beginning was made yesterday with 'The Messiah'; and in the evening Dr. Heap's new Cantata, 'The Maid of Astolat,' challenged judgment with an emphatically successful result. . . . Dr. Swinnerton Heap's music is artistic throughout; and there is a tenor scene, superbly sung by Mr. Edward Lloyd, which promises to oust the hackneyed 'Lend me your aid' and Walther's Preislied out of the field."

THE QUEEN.

"The music of the Cantata is very ably written, and is thoroughly melodious throughout, the tournament scene being very graphically realised, and some of the choral numbers particularly well devised. The solos were effectively sung, . . . and the Cantata was accorded a very flattering reception."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

"One cannot but observe the excellence of the workmanship throughout. There is no slipshod writing, no appearance of haste or carelessness; but the composer proves himself in all a master of his craft. . . . The conclusion of the Cantata gave rise to a scene assuredly never before witnessed in Wolverhampton. Dr. Heap was cheered to the echo, and, being recalled, was the recipient of a most enthusiastic demonstration of delight from audience and performers. He thoroughly deserved his success, for his work is of first-rate merit."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY GAZETTE.

"There is no hazard in the statement that the production of 'The Maid of Astolat' will make the seventh Wolverhampton Festival ever memorable. That Dr. Heap's latest music is far in advance of anything he has written before is unquestionable; and it may be said that it is as good as anything of its kind that has been written since Sterndale Bennett wrote his 'May Queen' for Leeds, or Henry Smart wrote his 'Bride of Dunkerron' for Birmingham. It begins finely, and the quality is maintained to the end. There is not a poor number in it, but there are many numbers of irresistible power and beauty, which none but the most unappreciative can fail to admire."

WOLVERHAMPTON EXPRESS.—SPECIAL MUSICAL CRITIC.

"Neither time nor opportunity serve for an ultimate judgment on this an essentially dramatic work; but this much I can assert, and that is, that it must lift Dr. Heap very near the front rank, and, if he could but be persuaded to put it in form for its proper habitat, the stage, it would hold its own against any grand opera of this generation."

MIDLAND EVENING NEWS.

"From first to last the composer exhibits that earnest appreciation of the subject before him without which music, allied to so dramatic a lyric, would simply become meaningless. Throughout it is tender, elegant, impassioned, or tranquil, in every respect appropriate to the poem. The fourth and last scene is again vigorous, but now interwoven with music of the most luscious description. The tenor air in C, 'Why beats with rapturous thrill this heart?' equals in suavity and pathetic tenderness anything that has been written for the tenor voice. . . . With this work Dr. Heap has undoubtedly achieved for himself a position amongst English composers equal to that attained by any writer of this class of works since Henry Smart or Sir Sterndale Bennett, and we heartily congratulate him on his well-deserved success."

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

NOVEMBER 1, 1886.

ANOTHER USE FOR CATHEDRALS.

IN THE MUSICAL TIMES for October we were able to announce the intention of the Dean of Gloucester to open his Cathedral once a fortnight, throughout the winter, for the gratuitous performance of sacred compositions. The few remarks we then made upon the subject expressed the entire and hearty approval of every man who looks at Dr. Butler's step in the light of a liberal and commonsense mind. Naturally, therefore, we were not surprised when some of our daily contemporaries took the matter up, and a correspondence arose in which representative men of various interested classes, clergymen among them, agreed to praise the sagacity and philanthropy of the late Master of Harrow. Since then the movement has fairly been set on foot, and an experiment, watched by the eyes of foes as well as friends, is now in progress at Gloucester, the issues of which may be very important.

The nature and end of that experiment should be very clearly understood, and, therefore, we will state them here in words of the plainest character. In the course of a sermon preached at the opening of the late Gloucester Festival, Dr. Butler dwelt most emphatically upon the comforting power of sacred music, above all in the case of those who suffer through poverty or affliction. We will not stop to enquire into the implied assumption that sacred music is able to comfort—to draw the spirit of man upwards and, for the time, away from earthly cares. No demonstration of this can be needed, because it is a fact in the experience of most of us. Taking the fact, Dr. Butler urged upon his congregation the duty of spreading abroad so benign an influence. He called upon the rich to make provision, in this respect, for the poor, and upon the musically gifted so to employ their talent as that the humblest may benefit. But the Dean did not stop short at pulpit exhortation. Hardly was the Festival over before it appeared that he had made up his mind to set a practical example, and prompt a general use of available means by turning to account those lying within his own reach. Dr. Butler's letter to the local journals clearly showed that he contemplated performances of sacred works in his Cathedral, not to promote the interests of the art per se, but to use its power for the spiritual edification and comfort of the people. He asked the poor and needy to attend, that the music, tinged by sacred subjects and surroundings, might lift them for the nonce out of themselves, arouse tender feelings, excite aspirations after the beautiful and good, and generally soften nature hardened by contact with a rough world. The Dean's scheme, therefore, nowhere conflicts with musical enterprises of the ordinary kind. It is not designed to cultivate art, but to improve humanity by the application of art. We believe that, in this regard, good results must follow abundantly. Such an issue belongs to the very nature of things, for the answer of even a hardened spirit to the tender appeal of music, as heard in a great Cathedral, follows as inevitably as effects follow the working of a cause. No perceptible good may appear all at once, but in the instant experience of many some consolation will be conveyed, some susceptibilities awakened, and some sense imparted of higher and better things than the common concerns of a struggling life.

It follows from the general design of the Gloucester performances, that the music given must be simple. To fly over the heads of the people whose benefit is chiefly sought would be worse than folly, especially when it is considered that, as a general rule, the simplest music is the most touching. None but the cultured few can penetrate to the inner chambers of the art and receive in all their fulness the communications which mighty masters convey through elaborate means. Such places are closed to the masses, who, if admitted, could only indulge a vague wonder, imparting no sense of satisfaction. But all, learned and unlearned alike, can feel the power of an eloquent melody, and of plain and solid harmonies. Such things come, more or less, within the universal perception, and it is upon their power that men and women who take music to the "common people" must rely. Dean Butler and his excellent organist, Mr. C. L. Williams, both see and act upon this fact, if we may judge by the programme of the initial performance. After a collect and the Lord's Prayer, intoned by the Precentor, Mr. Williams played, as an organ solo, a selection from the "Creation," and the volunteer choir of near upon 100 voices sang Malan's simple anthem, "O Lord my God, hear Thou the prayer Thy servant prayeth." These were followed by Beethoven's Funeral March (organ); "O rest in the Lord," sung by an amateur of the neighbourhood; the Pastoral Symphony, in "The Messiah"; "I know that my Redeemer liveth," with the chorus "Since by man came death"; and a selection from the "Hymn of Praise" as an organ solo; the whole musical function ending with a hymn in which the vast congregation heartily joined. Nothing in this programme could have missed its mark, since each piece is, by its very nature, interesting to the least cultured of those over whom music exercises any power at all. Who can measure the healthy impression made as the divine music of great masters sounded through that solemn Cathedral in the ears of a hushed assembly? More eloquent than the sermons of the finest preacher must have been the consolation of "O rest in the Lord," and the supreme faith of "I know that my Redeemer liveth." So was the good Dean's principal object gained.

Another aspect of the case now presents itself. Though the purpose of these gatherings is not chiefly artistic cultivation, it must needs be that they do much to promote genuine musical taste among the masses. Observe the character of the Gloucester programme. While nowhere above the comprehension and sympathy of the people, it contains the illustrious names of Haydn, Handel, Mendelssohn, and Beethoven, the force of whose genius was brought to bear, mainly for emotional impressions, but inevitably, also, for culture. It is the happy fortune of our art to possess countless works which all can appreciate though they show the mark of highest talent. Hence the repertory of an enterprise like that started at Gloucester is practically unlimited. There is not, and never will be, the smallest need to draw upon the simple commonplace, so much do simple masterpieces abound. Here is an immense leverage for the raising of those whom the Dean of Gloucester attracts to his Cathedral. The influence of the building and of religious sentiment will make the hearer's nature susceptible, and throw it open to the working of music than which, though never elaborate, nothing higher or more moving of its kind exists. It follows that while men who seek the moral and spiritual welfare of their fellows may assist or emulate the Gloucester enterprise with a certainty of resultant good, others can do the same who desire to increase amongst our people love of a pure and ennobling art.

Passing from considerations and conclusions which are so obvious that we ought to apologise for dwelling upon them, let us point out that the new machinery set in motion on Severn bank needs careful handling. Very little unwisdom would serve to wreck it, and we earnestly entreat all who may venture upon the enterprise to think of what they do. Undertakings of the kind are often started well yet fail, because the original lines are soon departed from. What are the points about which the utmost anxiety should be shown? In the first place, musical performances in cathedrals and churches should be regarded as primarily intended for those to whom other musical opportunities are denied. Amateurs who can afford to attend concerts, or who have the gift of making good music in their own homes, must clearly understand that deans and chapters, rectors and organists, are not working for their good. Some one may ask: "Are we to understand that the upper and middle classes should hold themselves apart from the enterprise?" Certainly not. They can help it by consecrating whatever musical gifts they possess to its service. Let them join the choir, or, if capable, offer their aid as soloists. They can help it, also, by urging their dependents and humble neighbours to avail themselves of the benefits open to them. In this field of labour, we are glad to say, there are willing workers at Gloucester. Mr. C. L. Williams himself visited the slums of the city, armed with bills and programmes, and strove his utmost to make the poor and ignorant clearly understand a movement which, to their suspicious minds, doubtless seemed inexplicable. But while the "betters" of those for whom the performances are intended thus actively exert themselves, they should be careful to refrain from influencing the choice of music and its general presentation by reference to their own tastes. Here lies the great danger. Everything should be done in the exercise of simplicity and humility. There should be no desire to "show off" anywhere or anyhow; no longing after artistic display for its own sake or the glory of those who make it. To use the beautiful old figure, the performers should "become as a little child," and minister in child-like fashion to those whose tastes in music have not grown with their growth and strengthened with their strength. By keeping this cardinal point in view a sure guide to success is obtained. So long as they are impressed by, or interested in what is done, the attendance of the poor may be looked for, but once lose touch of them through going whither their appreciation cannot follow, and "Ichabod" may be written on the enterprise. These facts will not be lost sight of at Gloucester, where the intelligence and discretion of the Cathedral Organist give ample surety for wise management.

We are glad to know that the first Cathedral performance was largely attended by the class whose benefit is chiefly sought, and that the reverential bearing of the vast gathering was all that the most exacting in that matter could have desired. This is a most important point, because indulgence in conduct which, though harmless per se, is unbecoming under the roof of God's House, would certainly tend to hinder, if it could not altogether prevent, a spread of the movement inaugurated by Dean Butler. We believe that the people may be trusted here as elsewhere. We will go farther, and say that they are less likely than others to forget where they are, since custom, it may be assumed, has not blunted their sensibilities. There remains but to urge upon all who have control over our cathedrals and churches the necessity of doing as the Dean of Gloucester has done. We are sometimes told that the masses are slipping away from the Church, and every observant man knows that there is an appalling amount of truth in the statement. Under such circumstances it is folly to neglect any legitimate means by which the movement may be counteracted. We would say, above all, try the power of sacred music—not as in regular religious service, but alone, save for the prayer that invokes a blessing. Its voice will attract within sacred walls many who would resist all other influences to the same end, and it may be depended upon to soften the heart, refine the nature, and open up a new source of enjoyment the after-taste of which is not bitter.

MAZZINI AND WAGNER.

It is useful, in writing about an art, to turn sometimes aside from the beaten track of specialists and technical experts to the broad highway trodden by men whose lives and thoughts were animated by wider and more general aims, and thus to relieve art from its splendid but barren isolation, history from its dreary, unintelligible monotony. If there was one man who moved in the very mid-stream of modern European progress it was Mazzini. He, if any man, was typical of the political and literary tendencies of the age in which he lived; but he was no musician; no niche is scooped out for him in Sir George Grove's Pantheon; Mr. Gurney dismisses him with an angry sneer for speaking of Beethoven as a mystic, and of Donizetti, then a young musician, as promising great things. Yet Mazzini had his views on music, and they were views which were substantially the same as those which were destined, some years later, to exercise the deepest influence over the course of musical development.

It was in 1833 that Mazzini's "Philosophy of Music" first appeared; it is now republished in Vol. IV. of the English Edition of his Life and Writings. It is to this republication that reference will be made in the following remarks.

Mazzini, like Wagner, strove after "a new music," "a European music," "the art of the future," "the music of the future" (pp. 51, 19, 32, 54). Like Wagner, he sought to obtain this object by bringing music into nearer relation with other arts, other arts into nearer relation with life. "Music," he said, "must be reconsecrated to a mission; we must connect that mission with the general mission of the arts of the epoch, and seek its character from the character of the epoch" (p. 36). And the regenerated art which should serve as a golden bridge between art and politics was to be opera, or as Mazzini and, in later years, Wagner re-baptised it, "musical drama."

But in what sense was "musical drama" to make itself an influence in the social and political arena? In the first place, it must be earnest. Schopenhauer—Wagner's philosophic master—regards earnestness as the fundamental characteristic of all music. Both Hegel and Wagner distinguish music from other arts by attributing to it "an elemental might," "a demoniacal might." Music is a serious, forceful reality; it is belying its own inmost nature if it attempts to assume an attitude of elegant, trifling neutrality in the world. And secondly, it is language—"the sole language which, by being common to all nations, is explicitly prophetic of humanity" (p. 13). This is no mere metaphor in Mazzini and Wagner's writings. Wagner recurs to it again and again as the key-note of his philosophic system. "Music is the true, natural, living world language." "President Grant's dream of a single language which all men should speak is realised in the waking world; it exists in music." "Music fulfils Schiller's aspiration, 'Seid umschlungen Millionen.'" Some of the significance of regarding music as language may be illustrated by a passage from Hegel. "Colour," said Hegel, "tries, like music, to escape from the external world, and to fascinate us by its almost unsubstantial supernatural character; but there is this difference between colour art and musical art—the latter is far more intimately bound up with our mind and character, for it is the echo of our own voice, of the very accents in which we speak our feelings day by day, moment by moment." Both are mystical in their character; but music is nearer and more akin, and therefore comes more home to us than colour. Thirdly, music, like language, is especially adapted to express a national type of character. Through music, said Mazzini, Italy will fulfil the mission of Italy in the world; its mission is to show how one man (which is melody) can sacrifice himself on the altar of country (which is harmony), and by that sacrifice do the greatest thing which the greatest man can do. Wagner persistently repeats that it was not so much Beethoven who spoke through the immortal Nine Symphonies, but rather the spirit of Germany which spoke through him. He regards Lessing, Herder, Schiller, and Goethe as the founders of German drama, and therefore the fathers of German patriotism (yet Lessing and Herder ridiculed patriotism), and now he says the time has come for music-drama to assert the German character, and fulfil the German mission (Beruf) in the world. Wagner's conception of the character and mission of his fellow-countrymen is not clear cut and definite like Mazzini's conception. At one time it meant "the spirit to do a thing for the thing's sake, and for the pleasure of doing it" ("Kunst und Politik," xi.). At another time, this ideal resembles that which Fichte proclaimed to his fellow-countrymen when the French were in Berlin: "Germans," said Fichte, "possess a deep spiritual capacity to believe in national unity, although the signs of it in the political world were flickering, vanishing, or extinct." "It is a characteristic," wrote Wagner, "of German life that it builds from within; the everlasting God lives in it long before He raises from it the temple of His glory" (Burlingham's "Wagner," p. 274). Wagner's theory that in order to discover the essence, you must strip off the attributes of the national character, that in order to discover the pure elementary German character, you must revert to a period before German history began, sounds like the dim far-off echoes of a philosophic age that had gone by for ever. But Wagner's pervading dominant theory that the national ideal is the rallying point for national unity, and that the national ideal is most vividly impressed upon a nation by its artists, is a theory which was in harmony with the best teachings of Schiller in German poetry, Stein in German statesmanship, Fichte in German philosophy, and finally, of Mazzini as the exponent of the general drift and tendency of European culture. Self-reliance, self-assertion are the indispensable qualities of an artist's character. Anything that saps these qualities menaces the very existence of Art. Wagner inveighed against France as the source of the artistic degradation of his country. Napoleon's motto, "Dépayser," was fatal to self-respect, and therefore to artistic creation as well as to patriotism. The imitative, receptive, indiscriminating Germans who looked to Paris for their manners, fashions, can-cans, dramas, and even for their "William Tells" and "Fausts," played into his hands, and into the hands of those who thought with him: "As a reward we are the sport of Paris salons, and we deserve it" ("Der Freischütz in Paris," ii.). Mazzini also took up his parable against Parisian influence in art; it was enough for him that Italians who imported or copied Parisian art gave up self-help; were denationalised and, therefore, demoralised: "and even those whom you weakly seek to copy, repay you with reproaches, epigrams, or still more insulting pity" (p. 16). Wagner then was not the only "anti-Gallicist" in musical art. Mazzini preceded Wagner in urging Italy to renounce France and all her works. Both Mazzini and Wagner urged their fellow-countrymen to be above all things true to their native country in their art. Nor were the best French artists strangers to this sentiment. The same impulse which saddened and maddened Wagner when he saw "Der Freischütz" murdered in Paris, moved Madame de Stael to tears when she saw Racine hissed off the St. Petersburg stage. "What German," said Arndt, "would have taken it to heart if some German dramatist had been dishonoured?" Arndt regarded artistic patriotism as peculiarly French, peculiarly un-German. Yet both the French and the German artists wept over the "Song of Sion" sung in a strange land. In this sense Madame de Stael, no less than Wagner and Mazzini, was a patriot in Art.

Mazzini's criticism of the opera of his day was twofold. It had no earnestness; it was like the confused sounds which saluted Dante's ear in the "Inferno." We are reminded of that passage in the "Deutsche Kunst und Deutsche Politik," where Wagner says: "If the good spirits are not summoned, and with a good heart too, the furies from hell, in the shape of everything that is common and unclean, will be let loose" (vi.). Secondly, it was a patched mosaic; "fragmentary, unconnected, interrupted" (p. 24). "It is a series of cavatine, choruses, duets, terzetti, and finali"—a series, not a coherent whole. Particular effects were aimed at. "But the effect, the one general dominant effect, that should be irresistibly produced by the ensemble of the work? Who thinks of that? Who ever looks for a general idea in a musical drama?" (p. 10). Most assuredly Wagner insisted that the adoption of the attitude indicated by Mazzini was the condition without which no artistic opera could be produced. For this reason he inscribed "Lohengrin" with the Schumannesque title "Warum"; he meant to represent "the obstinate questionings of sense and outward things, fallings from us, vanishings." And not only in "Lohengrin," but in every other play he discards what he ironically calls "theatricalities," "effect pieces." His one aim is to present some central thought. True, similar criticisms had been passed before Mazzini or Wagner. Gluck pruned trills and superfluous ornaments; Hegel laid it down that unity was the life and breath of all music; raggedness (Zerrissenheit) was the bane of the Italian Opera. Neither, however, realised, as Mazzini and Wagner realised, the necessity that there was for a comprehensive, far-reaching reconstruction of operatic forms.

The first rule that Mazzini laid down for the reconstruction of operatic forms was, that the equal rank of Poetry and Music must be recognised. "I am speaking," he said, "of a time when poetry will no longer be the servant but the sister of music" (p. 47). Elsewhere he emphasises the womanly character of music (pp. 16, 30, &c.). Hegel and Schopenhauer each thought that one of these two arts must occupy a position of inferiority in the union or "sistering" (aufsichwestern) of the two. Wagner regarded the womanly character (das Ewig Weibliche) of music as furnishing a more equitable solution of the difficulty. The receptive power of music—what Mr. Gurney calls "its facility, 'se accaparer'"—its dependent yet all-embracing, its vague yet intensifying and ennobling nature—rendered union upon equal terms with the more masculine element of poetry possible. Both are in the drama slaves of Fate, yet in their mutual relations one is not before or after the other. They marry, but do not rule one another.

The second reform advocated by Mazzini was that the unrestricted dominion of melodies—"framed Melodies," Wagner would have called them—must be rebelled against. "We must emancipate ourselves," he said, "from the exclusive predominance of melody, and the exclusive representation of individuality, by which the Rossinian school is condemned to sink into that materialism which is the destruction of every form of art, learning, or enterprise" (p. 37). Realism, according to Wagner, was ruining art: "the slaves had revolted" (Kunst und Politik, vii.); riotous, disorderly equality prevailed; there was anarchy, not culture. He too attacked melodies in the name of artistic idealism.

But melody confers "form" or unity upon a piece. If melody is suppressed, some substitute must be devised to prevent music from becoming chaotic. One of Mazzini's suggestions was that the recitativo accompagnato should be restored to the importance and efficiency of which it was capable. The Aria represents the results, recitativo accompagnato reveals the inner springs of action; dramatic propriety demands that far more stress should be laid upon the latter than upon the former (p. 46). Another suggestion is even more strikingly Wagneresque: "Why not vary the nature and character of the melodies and accompaniments according to the nature and character of the personages on the stage? Why not, through the well-timed repetition of a special musical phrase, or of certain fundamental and striking chords, suggest the disposition of each, or the influence of the circumstances or natural tendencies that urge him along?" (p. 42). Wagner is often paraded both by his admirers and his enemies as the first to perceive new possibilities of musical development arising out of this principle (e.g., Gurney's "Power of Sound," p. 499). It would, perhaps, be more accurate to say that Wagner's originality as a critic consisted in the peculiar colouring which he gave to this conception by asserting that it was the specific function of music to convey "forebodings and reminiscences" (Ahnung und Erinnerung). Yet even here there is a curious coincidence between Mazzini's and Wagner's theories. Mazzini's accusation against German music was that it was only "music of preparation" (p. 31); or, as he says elsewhere, it was "elegiac; the music of remembrance" (p. 30), a sort of "paradise lost" (p. 17). There must be something more than blind chance in the fact that Mazzini's description of specifically German music and Wagner's specific description of all music are identical. Another suggestion for restoring unity to the musical drama was that "the chorus which, in the Greek drama, represented the unity of impression produced upon the judgment and conscience of the majority" should be assigned a leading place. No one can have read many pages of Wagner without becoming convinced of the profound effect which the position of the chorus in the Greek drama produced upon his critical tendencies. But Wagner's attitude upon this question was very bold and original. "Man errs in all his striving," or "Life is not the highest good," no longer need be said; music presents these ideas to the listener more directly and forcibly than words" (Burlingham's "Wagner," p. 214). "The Greek chorus is the orchestra" ("Music of the Future," translated by Dannreuther, p. 48). Mazzini had a dim idea that more use must be made of instrumentation and concerted music in order to revive the part which the chorus used to take in Greek tragedy; but he did not go straight to the root of the matter like Wagner. Wagner's observation has the ring of a genuine critical discovery.

There is much in Wagner's critical writings to which Wagnerites attach great value, and of which Mazzini made no mention, and we have made no mention here. "Music is the art from which the world explains itself to any consciousness as distinctly as the most profound philosophy," &c. ("Beethoven," translated by Dannreuther, p. 41). Here, and in a hundred other places, Wagner confuses speculative and artistic attitudes of mind, apparently without reason. Again, the dream theory of Wagner's, which he borrows from Schopenhauer, is a fine metaphor, equally applicable, however, to every art. "Poetry," said Keats, "is like the dream of Adam; we awake and find it true." Schopenhauer, however (and Wagner behind him), first limits it to music, then rides it to death. Again, about verse and voice: Wagner reverses Voltaire's (or Addison's) dictum, and declares that the essential test of good poetry is that it can be put to music. This can never be regarded as anything but the merest paradox.

There are many theories of Wagner which seem very wild in the abstract, although his special application compels admiration. There is, as we have seen, his fallacious hankering after the "free, strong, noble man as nature made him." The heroes of legends and myths lived—if Sir Henry Mayne, "et id genus omne," are to be believed—in a highly artificial age; but the artistic impulse which impelled Wagner to choose legends and myths may well have been not their natural, but their national import, not because there alone human nature is unmasked, but because human nature is hidden there behind a dreamy mystic veil (cp. "Music of the Future," p. 38). Did not Hegel say—"The subject for music should be some collective interest" (die Gemeinde). "No better subject could be chosen than Enchantment" (Zauberei, "Æsthetic," pp. 207, 203). The philosophic motive which induced Wagner to make dramatic action, as represented by words, to dictate order in the same way as the dance rhythm upon which old "framed melodies" were based dictated order to a piece of music, may have been radically unsound; it may be necessary in a drama to make both words and music disobedient, and disobedient in different directions, to the order of events. It is obviously inaccurate to say with Schopenhauer, Wagner, and Mr. Hueffer that harmony has nothing to do with space (space means co-existence; co-existence includes harmony), or that time and rhythm are intruders in music (without time and rhythm, music is an abstraction); still Wagner's multitudinous "forest melodies," his perpetually changing harmonies which make you almost forget melody and rhythm, have a weird irresistible fascination all their own, and may well be compared, as Wagner compared them, to that impossible, yet magical art of almost shapeless, almost subjectless, pure colour-painting of which Hegel dreamed, and at which Turner tried to arrive, or to a religion without dogmas (see "Beethoven," p. 33, translated by Dannreuther). Such a development of music may be regarded as inspiring and entrancing without being invested with a deceptive finality. Art would lose vitality of spirit if it attained finality of form. Further, Wagner's observation that poetry must soon pass into philosophy or direct itself towards music ("Music of the Future," p. 30), may not be accepted as a declaration of what was absolutely and necessarily true, but it betrays a profound insight into the characteristic tendencies of modern poetry.

There is much bad philosophy and fine artistic instinct in Wagner of which not a trace can be found in the essay of Mazzini's, which is the subject-matter of these remarks. Yet the writings of Mazzini and Wagner are alike in that noble partiality "which is a man's best quality." Each thought that salvation would come neither from the north nor from the south, but from his own loved native land. Each thought that the prospects of music were beyond hope unless music allied itself to the other social forces and entered the "social synthesis." Music, they thought, could only break its prison chains and enter into the daylight, provided that it looked beyond itself, entered into some external alliance. More width was their cry. Otherwise music would be condemned to those esoteric arithmetical exercises, "that development of an exhausted idea" ("Mazzini," p. 2) which Hegel (see "Æsthetic," pp. 139, 213, &c.) no less than they deplored; those foolish, elaborate trivialities for which Carlyle, no less than they, expressed detestation (Carlyle's "Opera" Miscellanies, vol. vii.). Both Mazzini and Wagner looked in a similar direction to purify "the standing pool" ("Kunst und Politik," vii.), to set free "the perfume, the sacred incense of our civilisation" ("Mazzini," pp. 7, 51), to make "the Dew of Life" (Lebens Thau, Burlingham, p. 222) glisten once more. "Look outside you; the inner oracle is dumb; let in light and air from without, then you will be restored to health." Yet a wide view of things—the panacea of the high priests of culture—often distracts, and yields no solid fruit. Often, too, reform comes spontaneously from within. Musical idea is demanded by musicians for the sake of music, as well as by social reformers for the sake of adapting music to the circumstances of the century—by Schumann as well as by Mazzini. There are two paths to the same goal.

Goethe had no hesitation in advocating a method the opposite of that adopted by Mazzini and Wagner. "To restrict yourself to a trade is best. For the narrow mind, whatever he attempts, is still a trade; for the higher an art; and the highest in doing one thing does all" ("William Meister," ii., 178). "The musician, ever shrouded in himself, must cultivate his inmost being that so he may turn it outwards" (p. 252). According to Goethe, depth more often brings with it width of view than width of view brings depth. Plato, too, believed that strict exclusive concentration was the only path by which a large heart and a large mind might be attained. But we cannot lay down laws. The river of progress is not fed from a single source. "God fulfils Himself in many ways."

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

BIZET had contracted to deliver the score of his "Jolie Fille de Perth" at the end of 1866, but he had to work very hard to accomplish the task, since the necessity of living compelled a liberal employment of his pen upon "pot-boilers." Writing to a friend he said: "I am going to bed. I have not slept for three nights, and am looking too much at the black side of things. And I have lively music to make to-morrow." Later on he wrote: "If you knew my life for a month past! I work fifteen or sixteen hours a day, more sometimes, for I have lessons to give, proofs to correct—one must live. However, I am tranquil; there are four or five nights more (in the year), but I shall have finished. I am satisfied with myself, the opera is good, I am sure of it, for it is an advance." On December 29 the score was sent to M. Carvalho, and an arduous six months' task closed.

But Bizet was by no means "out of the wood." It is one thing to place an opera in a manager's hands, and quite another to see it brought out. So our composer found, and his troubles can be traced in a series of extracts from letters included by M. Edmond Galabert in his little brochure. In January,

1867, Bizet wrote: "We shall rehearse from March nearly to the end of May. Nilsson will go to London for two months, and make her rentrée here on August 15, in the 'Jolie Fille de Perth.'" In a letter dated February we read: "I am about to begin rehearsal. There are difficulties without number still in the way. . . . To be a musician now-a-days one needs to have an assured and independent means of living, or genuine diplomatic talent. I shall be heard, no doubt, in April, but can tell you nothing more. The theatre is a shifty place, where nobody can be certain of the morrow." In March he wrote: "The copyist is at work. . . . My première will come at the end of May; so put it down June 15, and there an end." In April there were still delays, and the composer resolved to put the work off, if possible, till the following winter. Then the leading rôle was given up by Nilsson, and handed over to Devriès; the summer passed, October came, and with it such hope of the longed-for day that Bizet wrote to a friend in the highest spirits: "I am completely satisfied. Never was an opera better announced; the general rehearsal produced a great effect; the piece is really most interesting; the interpretation is very excellent; the costumes are rich; the decorations new; the director is enchanted; the orchestra, the artists, are full of ardour, and, what is better than all, dear friend, the score of 'La Jolie Fille' is a good thing. I say this because you know me." Such exaltation of spirit often goes, like pride, before a fall, and poor Bizet soon found that this is a disappointing world. Speaking of the first performance he professed to have enjoyed the lively happiness of moving an audience not brimful of benevolence towards himself. Doubtless he enjoyed also the encomiums of the press; but the general public decided the fate of "La Jolie Fille" by regarding it with persistent coldness. The opera ran for twenty-one nights and then disappeared from the stage. A reason for this may perhaps be found in the words of M. Galabert: "He made the least possible concession to the false taste of the public, having respect, in the highest degree, for his art, and disdaining the success obtained by means which his artistic conscience reproved."

During the course of the events just recorded, M. Busnach opened the Athénée for comic opera, and produced a four-act piece, "Malbrough s'en va-t'en-guerre," of which one act was written by Bizet, one by Jonas, one by Délibes, and one by Legouix. The work was a great success, but Bizet, according to some authorities, had quite enough of that particular style of writing, and could not be induced to resume it. It is a fact, however, that in 1868 or 1869 he composed anonymously an opérette-vaudeville for the same manager. It was called "Sol-si-ré-pif-pa," and produced at the Menu-Plaisirs. The properties of this theatre being sold some years after Bizet's death, M. Busnach bought the parts for twenty-five francs—the score had been destroyed or lost—and handed them over to M. Puget, who had undertaken to write out a new score from them. Unfortunately the vocal parts were found to be missing, and that, of course, brought the enterprise to an end.

Bizet's next appearance was as a musical critic. In 1867 the Revue Nationale et Étrangère, since dead, made important changes in its appearance, character, and personnel, enlisting the services, amongst others, of our young composer. Bizet's first article appeared in the number dated August 3, of the year just named. It is thus described by M. Pigot: "This article possesses very great interest, beyond its qualities of style and dash, for it contains a double profession of faith—critical and æsthetic. Bizet tells us, with customary frankness, what he loved in art; declares himself the enemy of cliquism; a lover of broad ideas, without prejudice or party feelings; the opposite, in a word, of that which his detractors would have us believe he was—a crazy Wagnerian." The article contained a vindication of his conduct in taking up the critical pen, and then went on to say: "I shall tell the truth, nothing but the truth, and, as far as possible, all the truth. I belong to no coterie, I have no comrades, I have only friends, who will cease to be my friends on the very day when they cease to respect my freedom of judgment, my complete independence. Confining myself to an examination of things purely artistic, I shall study works and not concern myself with the label upon them. Respect for all—such is my motto. Neither an adulator nor an insulter—such is my line of conduct." After this prologue, Bizet went on into the heart of his subject, the nature of which and, also, his manner of treating it, are worth showing by extracts. He claimed for every composer a frank consideration, as what he is, not as what he might, could, would, or should be:—

"A poet, a painter, a musician consecrates the purest qualities of his mind and soul to the conception and execution of a work; he believes, doubts, becomes enthusiastic, despairs, rejoices, suffers, turn by turn, and when, more anxious and nervous than a criminal, he says 'Look and judge,' in place of allowing ourselves to be affected by his creation, we ask for his passport, we examine into his opinions, his relations, and his artistic antecedents. But this is not criticism; it is the action of a policeman. The artist has no name; no nationality; he is inspired or he is not inspired; he has, or has not, genius and talent; if he have, we are bound to adopt, love, and acclaim him; if he have not, it is our duty to respect, pity, and forget him. Name whom you will—Rossini, Auber, Gounod, Wagner, Berlioz, David, or Pitanchu, what matters? Make me laugh or weep, picture for me love, hate, fanaticism, crime; charm me; transport me with delight, and I certainly will not be such a fool as to class you and label you like a specimen in a museum."

In another place we read: "Let us then be unaffected and true; not asking, in a great artist, the qualities he lacks, but seeking to benefit by those he possesses. When a temperament passionate, violent, brutal even—when a Verdi endows art with a strong and living work, kneaded with mud, hatred, and blood, let us not say to him coldly, 'Dear Sir, that lacks taste; it is not distingué.' Distingué! Michael Angelo, Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, Beethoven, Cervantes, Rabelais—were they distingués?"

Subsequently, Bizet discusses various classes of musical critics: "Believe me, partial criticism is a cruel, terrible, mortal weapon. I have been the pupil and friend of Halévy, and more than once have received his confidences on this matter. Neither his high position nor his indisputable glory could console him for the odious and unjust attacks to which he was subjected. Did he not suffer all his life from the ridiculous accusation of Wagnerism, to which he was particularly sensitive." Concerning pedantic criticism he thus speaks: "I have a horror of pedantry and sham learning. Certain third rate or fourth rate critics use and abuse a technical jargon, as unintelligible to them as to the public. I shall guard myself carefully against such a ridiculous course. Here you will find no talk about octaves, fifths, tritones, false fifths, dissonances, consonances, preparations, resolutions, suspensions, inversions, broken, interrupted, or evaded cadences. I shall send the lovers of such talk to the scholastic articles of M. de L—, there they may learn, among other things of the same palpitating interest, that Nicoli has written the "Rendezvous Bourgeois" in non-reversible counterpoint; that it is needful to hear Mendelssohn's instrumentation with scrupulous attention, the author of the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' treating the part of the second bassoon as melodiously as that of the first violin," &c. The article ends thus: "Of a truth, I tell you, composers are the pariahs, the martyrs of modern society. Like the gladiators of old, they fall crying, 'Salve popule, morituri te salutant.' O music! what a splendid art! but what a sad vocation! However, let us wait!—let us wait!—above all, let us hope!"

Bizet's first literary effort shows that he had a brilliant and incisive pen, but, obviously, the article was written, not by a critic, but by a composer desirous at once of vindicating himself and assailing his enemies. This fact may have struck the editor, and had consequences. Anyhow, Bizet's first effusion in the pages of the Revue Nationale was his last, and not even his most intimate friends could say why the journal and its musical critic so soon parted company.

Soon after the "Jolie Fille de Perth" vanished from the stage, Bizet was requested to complete a Biblical opera, "Noé," left unfinished by his old master, Halévy. He accepted the thankless task, out of consideration for an honoured memory, but soon found that it tried him severely. Halévy left little better than a sketch behind him, and his pupil was not of the plodding sort who can patiently strive to penetrate the intentions of another, and in his personality sink their own. Once the wearied Bizet abandoned his uncongenial labour, but was induced to take it up again, and then to endure to the end. At this time instrumental music very much engaged his attention in various ways. He arranged "Mignon" and "Hamlet" for the solo pianoforte, and threw himself with ardour into the work of composition for the same instrument, being stimulated thereto by his friend, Henri Delaborde. Amongst other things, Bizet composed his "Grandes Variations Chromatiques," declared by himself to be "very audacious" in treatment; and also a Nocturne. It was our composer's duty, moreover, to read at the piano the various operas sent to M. Carvalho for acceptance at the Lyrique. This he did with wonderful facility, his power of playing from score being as great as his command of the instrument. Several stories are current regarding the ability in question. For example, M. Armand Gouzien testifies that when Offenbach brought from London the MS. score of Gounod's "Jeanne d'Arc," Bizet sat down, without previous examination, and played it from beginning to end with as near an approach to orchestral effect as the instrument would allow; often singing passages with the friends who looked over his shoulder. M. Pigot relates an anecdote to the same effect. In 1861 Halévy entertained at dinner several intimate friends, including Franz Liszt, and Georges Bizet, then just returned from Rome. After the meal, Liszt sat down to the piano and played a new composition bristling with difficulties of the most astounding character. He was, of course, warmly congratulated upon a wonderful display of executive skill, and, in answer to some remark about the difficulties of the piece, said, "Yes, it is difficult, horribly difficult; and I know in Europe only two pianists who can play it as it is written and at the required speed—Hans von Bülow and myself." Presently, Halévy went to the piano and called Bizet's attention to a passage which had excited his curiosity, at the same time striking a few chords. Bizet at once sat down and played the passage from memory without the slightest mistake. Liszt, astonished, exclaimed, "Wait, young man, I have the manuscript; that will aid your memory."

The manuscript was placed on the desk, and the gifted Frenchman proceeded to play the piece through in a manner best estimated by its composer's words of congratulation: "My young friend, I believed that there were only two men capable of struggling against the difficulties of that piece, but I was deceived. We are three, and I am bound in justice to add that the youngest of the three is, perhaps, the most audacious and most brilliant."

The question naturally arises why a pianist, gifted in so remarkable a measure, did not perform in public? M. Pigot suggests that Bizet hesitated to come within range of the popular prejudice which limits pianists to their own specialty, and refuses to believe that they can do anything out of it. He avers that many great artists have had to struggle a long time against this feeling before conquering it, and puts forward Saint-Saëns, Liszt, and Rubinstein as cases in point. There is, no doubt, something in this. A feeling does exist against recognising a virtuoso outside his virtuosity; but whether it is strong enough to deter a sensible man from assuming that character lest he should be disqualified in others is a moot point. There may be another explanation of Bizet's conduct. Although, as years went on and his fame grew, the composer appeared more and more in society, his nature was evidently a retiring one. That of the really great artist is often so. Its fibre is too delicate and sensitive for contact with the world, and it can find little gratification in the conventional usages of society.

Bizet's next task was the composition of an opera entitled "La Coupe du Roi de Thulé." The circumstances were somewhat peculiar. It appears that, in 1867, the French Government resolved in a practical manner to encourage young composers for the lyric stage, whether prix de Rome or not, by means of a competition for the honour of producing a piece at the Grand Opéra, the Opéra Comique, and the Théâtre Lyrique. M. Diaz carried off the Grand Opéra prize with his "Coupe du Roi de Thulé"; M. Leneveu's "Le Florentin" was successful at the house in the Rue Favart; and M. Philipot's "Magnifique" at the Lyrique. Bizet at first hesitated to take part in the contest. The conditions were open to suspicion, and men who respected themselves shrank from submitting to the judgment of a tribunal which failed to command confidence. At last, however, he entered upon the task, and, aiming as high as possible, began setting to music the libretto issued from the Grand Opéra. His heart, however, was not in the work, and when, as he busied himself with the second act, a commission came to him from the Opéra Comique, Bizet abandoned the competition—luckily, no doubt, for M. Diaz. Our composer's friend, M. Galabert, also began setting the same libretto to music, and his brochure contains some interesting quotations of the counsel he received from Bizet. These may be looked at as, so far as they go, a confession of their author's musical faith. "One of his first recommendations," says M. Galabert, "was not to cover up the text with too full an accompaniment when the action or the words demanded a clear expression." In such a case Bizet preferred an accompaniment of detached chords. He insisted, further, upon constant regard for form. "Reverie, incision, spleen, discouragement, disgust, should be expressed, like other sentiments, by solid means. It is essential that this be done always." "I repeat again and again . . . without form, no style; without style, no art." Then follows a careful study of the characters and situations in the opera on which both the friends were engaged. It is too long for quotation here, but to read it is to see with what intelligence and regard for true dramatic expression Bizet approached his work.

The order of events now brings us to the Symphony "Souvenirs de Rome," already mentioned more than once. Our composer's original idea was to write a work modelled on the symphonies of Mendelssohn. "But," says M. Pigot, "certain modifications soon appeared necessary. He thought, reasonably enough, that he ought not to cleave absolutely to the forms which had immortalised the Masters—that he ought to make innovations—if only in part—and thus give to his work some original and personal features." Hence, he composed a first movement on the plan of an air with variations. Nothing could be more injudicious than this, and Bizet soon recognised the mistake. He removed the variations, at the same time making such other important changes from the first design that the Symphony became rather a "grand descriptive Fantasia" than what was originally intended. When it was completed he wrote to M. Galabert:—"I have finished the Symphony. The variations have been given up. The first movement, I think, will be fine. It is the old theme, preceded by an important introduction of a calm character, which returns in the middle, in the midst of agitation, and again to conclude the piece in complete tranquility. This is new and I reckon upon a good effect. The middle of the Andante is the second theme of the Finale, which lends itself marvellously well to that broad movement. Curious! Music is Satanée. We understand nothing whatever about it."

The Symphony, described in the programme as "Souvenirs de Rome, Fantaisie Symphonique," was first played, February 28, 1869, at a Concert given by M. Padeloup in the Cirque Napoléon. It consisted of three movements, which were thus labelled:—"1st, A Hunt in the Forest of Ostie; 2nd, A Procession; 3rd, The Carnival at Rome." But, according to M. Pigot, none of these movements, the last excepted, were written to the titles above given. The titles were fitted to the music, according to the plan deliberately followed by Schumann. It would seem that the reception of the work, though not enthusiastic, contented Bizet. He wrote to Galabert:—"My Symphony has gone well. First movement: a round of applause, some chuts; second round, a hiss; third round. Andante: a round. Finale: much effect, three rounds of applause, chuts, three or four hisses. In short, success." But the Symphony was never again played while Bizet lived. After his death it was published with some modifications, the general title being changed to "Roma," the descriptive headings of the first two movements being abolished, and a Scherzo, written in Rome, introduced, according to the composer's original intention. In this form the Symphony was a second time played by M. Padeloup (October 31, 1880), and has since met with considerable success.

On June 3, 1869, Bizet married Geneviève, daughter of Halévy—an event not unnaturally followed by resumed work upon the Biblical opera, "Noé," left incomplete by his wife's father. The piece was to have been brought out at the Lyrique, but a difficulty arose. No proper bass or prima donna could be obtained, and, said Bizet, "If I cannot find them, 'Noé' must wait." "Noé" did wait, till the war of 1870 broke out, and all hope for it vanished. In 1885, however, the Halévy-Bizet opera made a début at Carlsruhe, concerning which event the Paris Figaro published a despatch as follows:—"Yesterday, first performance, at the Grand Ducal Theatre, of 'Noé,' opera in three acts and four tableaux, by Halévy and Bizet. Execution uncommonly good; ensemble remarkable, under the direction of Félix Motte, with his admirable orchestra. Stage effects splendid; the Deluge made a deep impression. Managers and directors of theatres attended the performance, which was a triumph."

With "Noé" out of hand, our composer took up the commission entrusted to him by the Opéra Comique, where M. du Locle then reigned. For this he accepted two books—"Griselidis," by Sardou, and "Clarissa Harlowe," by Philippe Gille—beginning work upon both in May, 1870. The war broke out shortly afterwards, and, in the end, neither was completed. Bizet was profoundly afflicted by the opening of that tremendous conflict. He had the eye of a seer, and wrote: "And our poor philosophy, our dreams of universal peace, our world-wide fraternity, our federation of peoples! Instead of all this, tears, blood, heaps of carcases, crimes without number, without end. I cannot tell you, my dear friend, into what depths of sadness all these horrors plunge me. I am a Frenchman, and do not forget it, but I cannot altogether ignore the fact that I am a man. This war will cost humanity 500,000 lives. As for France, she will leave all in it. Alas!" These remarkable words were penned, it should be observed, in the midst of a national delirium, and before a shadow of disaster had fallen on the French arms.

Bizet's next work was "Djamileh," with the composition of which also he was entrusted by Du Locle. The book had been written by Louis Gallet to meet some ideas, supposed to be regenerative, of the manager. Its poetry was extatic; its construction antisécenique, and its whole character such that the composer's biographers are at a loss to account for his acceptance of it. As a matter of fact, Bizet, who disliked the prevailing style of opera, tried to induce a reaction against one extreme by going to the other. The move was a false one, and did him little good, but there can be no doubt that it was honestly made, and with the benefit of art in view. The first performance took place on May 22, 1872, and was thus commented on by the composer: "'Djamileh' is not a success, nevertheless I am extremely satisfied with the results obtained. The press notices have been very interesting, for never has an opéra-comique in one act been more seriously and, let me add, passionately discussed. . . . Reyher (les Débats), Weber (Le Temps), Guillemot (Le Journal de Paris), Joncières (La Liberté), that is, more than half the force of the daily press, have been very warm. Saint Victor, Jouvain, &c., have been favourable in the sense that they allow inspiration and talent, all spoiled by the influence of Wagner. That which satisfies me more than the opinion of all these gentlemen is the absolute certainty that I have hit upon my right course. I know what I am doing."

Here we will leave Bizet for a time. In our next we shall see him doing better and more lasting work.

AN ANCIENT MANUSCRIPT OF FRENCH MINSTREL SONGS.*

IN a recent historical sketch of the Sienese School of Music, I mentioned, among the many valuable unpublished works which adorn the archives and public libraries of Siena, an ancient MS. of French Minstrel Songs; and so little is known of this, in some respects, unique collection, that I need not apologise if I notice its salient features somewhat more in detail.

The term "minstrel" is, as we know, usually and indiscriminately applied to the bards or poet-singers of the south of France, the "troubadours," and to those of the north of France, the "trouvères." Both are happy and expressive terms, signifying that the minstrels, properly so called, "found"—viz., were the authors of the songs they sang; but there is this fundamental difference between them, that the troubadours, who flourished in the eleventh and twelfth centuries—and some of whom, such as Lordello of Mantua, Betramo of Bormio, and Arnaldo Marvello, have been immortalised by Dante in his "Divina Commedia"—sang in Provençal, the "langue d'oc"; whereas the trouvères, whose fame reached its zenith in the thirteenth century, and endured even in the fourteenth, when the troubadours had already vanished from the scene, sang in the Romance language of northern France, the "langue d'oïl" or "d'oui," from which sprang the French language of our own day.

Owing to a palpable misnomer on an old label, the MS. preserved in the Municipal Library of Siena was for a long time regarded as a collection of Provençal or troubadours' songs. As a matter of fact, however, there is not a single troubadour song in it, and the MS. is made up entirely and exclusively of trouvères' songs of the thirteenth century, collected and written out in the early part of the fifteenth century. The hundred and one compositions it contains are written in Gothic style, in vogue at that time, on fifty-four leaves of parchment in quarto form; and the first letter of each song is very beautifully and brilliantly illuminated in red, blue, and gold; the first letter of each succeeding verse, as also the margin of each page being similarly, and with great taste, ornamented in red and blue.

The music, for solo voice, is written in the old notation, to the first verse of each song; the notes being black, on four red lines. Although the MS. has no title page, it yet forms a compact and complete volume; the text and the colours are preserved in all their pristine freshness; the illuminations are perfect and intact; and the MS. has had the rare fortune of escaping the fate of similar works which, like the famous Vatican MS. of 1490, have been mutilated and rendered incomplete by rapacious and ignorant collectors of miniatures. The Siena MS. is handsomely and elegantly bound, the maroon covering being ornamented with griffins, dragons, and fleurs-de-lis, from which latter M. Louis Passy, who examined the MS. in 1859, drew the inference that it must have been bound in Italy about the sixteenth century. This, however, is little more than a fanciful speculation; for as the fleurs-de-lis might point to the arms of Florence, so might the griffins and dragons point to the "ambrogette," or designs on terra-cotta, which at that time were a famous specialty of Sienese art. It is much more probable that the MS. was bound in France, and came to Italy in its present state; for its figured covering is the exact reverse of the plain white parchment binding then in vogue in Italy; moreover, the volume altogether has a decidedly French "cachet" about it. But how it came to Italy and to Siena is a mystery which, so far, the most diligent research has not solved; all that I have been able to establish with tolerable certainty is that it formed part of the library of Uberto Benvoglianti, an eminent Sienese philologist and antiquarian of the eighteenth century, and that, as part of that library, it was left to the Municipal Library by his daughter. The costly, finished, and elegant form of the MS., the purity and beauty of the text, and the evident care bestowed on the notation warrant the conjecture that the collection was either written by order of, or presented to, some noble family or person of high rank as an album containing a choice selection of trouvères songs of the thirteenth century.

The value of the Siena MS. is enhanced by the fact that it contains some fourteen compositions which do not exist in any of the other MS. collections that have been handed down to us; such as those of the Vatican of 1490 and 1522 (that of 1490 being the celebrated, but incomplete, "Fauchet" MS., which Queen Christina of Sweden lent to the Vatican); of Modena, Paris, Arras, Montpellier (this last also contains compositions in Provençal), Berne, the Hague, Copenhagen, Stockholm, and of Oxford (Bodleian). The genuineness of the Siena collection as an original MS. is, therefore, placed beyond doubt; and it is almost inconceivable that, with the exception of an able, but somewhat complicated and unwieldy analysis by M. Louis Passy in the "École des Chartres" (1859),* nothing should hitherto have been published on a MS. so interesting both from an artistic and historical point of view.

It would be impossible to understand, much less to appreciate, the peculiar and intrinsic merits of the Siena MS., without having an adequate idea of the influences and surroundings under which the trouvères composed and sang their lyric poetry. As in the south of France and throughout Europe, so also in northern France, the revival of the spirit of chivalry at the time of the crusades gave a powerful impulse to that heroic poetry which, in imitation of the Arab poets with whose works the Christian knights became acquainted in the East, took the form of ardent devotion to the fair sex, and, as such, became the fashion, not to say the mania of the age. The cultivation of lyric poetry was, moreover, favoured by the courts and sovereign princes of the time, notably by St. Louis, and most of all by Thibaut IV., Duke of Champagne and King of Navarre (1201-1253), himself a poet-singer of no mean order. The leading trouvères belonged chiefly to the nobility and gentry, though, later on, also to the middle class; and most of them accompanied their own songs on the harp, lyre, or other instruments of that kind, while those who were not musicians themselves, retained in their service professional players of lower social position, the so-called "jongleurs" or "bastard-trouvères." It was these latter who, through time, became the true "wandering minstrels"; nay, whatever may be said against their pluming themselves with the feathers of their masters and dragging art into the market place, they were the real means of popularising that lyric poetry which, till then, had been the almost exclusive possession of a privileged class.

The vigorous impulse imparted to music and poetry by the trouvères culminated in the so-called "Puys" or High Courts ("Puy" being literally an eminence or high place, from podium)—viz., meetings or festivals which were held periodically in the different cities of Picardie and Artois under the auspices of the nobility and gentry, forming a kind of literary and musical co-fraternity or society. The original and avowed object of these meetings was the glorification of the Virgin, being the "Lady most noble and sublime"; indeed, the "Puys" were under the patronage of the Virgin, and were known as "Notre Dame du Puy d'Arras," of Caen, Rouen, Boulogne, Evreux, and other cities. No doubt, however, this uniform praise of "Our Lady" as the sole object of these meetings, became, in the long run, rather monotonous, more especially in assemblies so merry and festive as those that gathered round the brilliant Court of Thibaut IV., at Arras; and hence the proceedings were gradually and ingeniously varied by songs in praise of "The Lady" simply (by tacit consent the fair sex generally), until each trouvère came to sing in praise of his own special lady-love, "my lady," whose name, although not mentioned, was generally well known, either from his love adventures, or from his devotion to the fair lady for whose good graces he was sighing at the time.

These musical and literary festivals generally began with a procession and mass in honour of the local Notre Dame, after which the proceedings of the Puy, properly speaking, were opened in the meeting hall, where seats of honour were reserved for the president, called the "Prince du Puy," for the judges, the ladies, and other persons of distinction. The solo performances of the trouvères whose compositions (reduced to writing by scribes or clerks) had been accepted, and who, on these occasions, generally represented officially the Puys of their respective cities, consisted of "pastourelles," "sirventes" (a kind of satire), "ritournelles," "lais" (songs of an elegiac character), and the like, and were followed by the famous "jeux-partis"—viz., tournaments or contests in lyric poetry.

These latter generally constituted the great feature of the programme, the more so as, not unfrequently, three or four of the leading trouvères, and even the president, took part in them as competitors for the prize.* The jeu-parti, like the "tenson" of the troubadours, always opened with a challenge in due form, the challenging trouvère throwing down the gauntlet and calling upon his adversary or adversaries to answer, in rhyme and song, a given question; the answer was met by a rejoinder, and thus the contest was kept up by alternate verses and amidst the growing excitement of performers and audience alike, until one of the contending parties stopped and called upon the judges, previously agreed upon, to pronounce judgment, crown the winner as "King" of the Puy, and award the prize, which generally consisted in a silver chaplet or a rose of gold, not to speak of the sweet smiles and tender glances of the fair ladies, some of whom, not unfrequently, even acted as judges.† I need hardly add that these festivals always wound up with a more or less sumptuous banquet; and no doubt, later on, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, when the glory of the trouvères was on the wane, the Puys were feasts quite as much as festivals, perhaps more so. The contest, of course, turned invariably on some love subject or other; and the prize questions which have been handed down to us are, as a whole, typical examples of that art of combining frivolity with ingenuity for which our neighbours across the Channel have ever been remarkable. To quote an example—Which of two admirers of the same lady will carry the day: the one who lavishes sweet speeches, or the other who lavishes beautiful presents upon her?‡ Or this—Which do you prefer: that your lady should regret her first cavalier, or that she should regret having chosen you?§ Or this—Which would you prefer: that the lady you admire should tell you plainly "there's no hope for you," or that she should give you a rendezvous and dissemble?|| Or, to give one more example—Which of two jealous lovers is more to be

* As an instance, I may quote a jeu-parti (in the Vatican MS. 1490) in which Jehan Bretel, the "Prince du Puy," challenges no fewer than three trouvères at the time: "Cuneliev, e vous Ferri, e vous aussi Grievlier, espondez."

† The jeu-parti between Bretel and Cuneliev, "Cuneliev or i para," Vatican (1522) MS., is an instance of this, the "judges" being "Demoiselle Eudes et Madame Margot."

pitted: the one who suspects his lady of deceiving him, or the other who has proofs of her deception?*

Some writers have contended that the Puy or "Courts of Love" of northern France were tribunals in which lovers' quarrels and domestic differences were settled by a code of honour. In truth, however, they were nothing of the kind, but simply tournaments in lyric poetry, in keeping with the character and spirit of an age at once chivalrous, frivolous, and sentimental. Moreover, the distinctly and essentially musical character of these meetings is proved, if proof were wanted, by the Siena MS., in which not only the solo songs, but all the jeux-partis, without exception, are set to music as they were originally sung.

One of the earliest and foremost trouvères was undoubtedly Le Châtelain de Coucy who died in the East, in 1192, from a wound received in battle. He was eminently representative of his class, and carried his sentimental devotion to his lady, Madame de Fayel, so far as to order his heart to be conveyed to her after his death. Unfortunately, his shield-bearer, when on the point of executing this order, was caught by the lady's jealous husband, who seized the "memento" contained in a box and, after causing it to be cooked and served at table, had the grim satisfaction of seeing the lady eat it; whereupon he told her the history of the dish. She retaliated, we are told, by taking a vow never to touch another morsel, and starved herself to death.—The twenty-four songs which have been handed down to us as the compositions of this celebrated trouvère were edited, in a beautiful collection, with modern notation and pianoforte accompaniment, in 1830, by M. Francisque Michel,† who, since then—viz., in 1837—has also edited Roland de Roncevaux's famous song,‡ dating, like De Coucy's songs, from the twelfth century.

To return now to the Siena MS. Of the hundred and one compositions it contains, seventy-seven are songs properly speaking, while the remaining twenty-four are jeux-partis, all by trouvères of more or less fame in the thirteenth century, including Thibaut IV. of Champagne, surnamed "le Chansonnier," some of whose songs figure in this, as they do also in other MSS., at the head of the collection. With the exception of nine songs by Colart le Bouteillier, whose name is added in red letters at the end of each song, the Siena MS. (which has no index) does not indicate the names of the composers; and these can, therefore, only be ascertained by a comparison with the other extant MSS. to which I referred at the outset. It is this comparison or concordance, carefully worked out by M. Passy, which not only established the absolute authenticity of the Siena MS., but also revealed the fact that ten of the songs and four of the jeux-partis are unique, in the sense that they are not to be found in any other MS. of trouvères' songs so far discovered. Although, owing to the very fact of their being unique, the names of the composers of the ten songs can only be stated with tolerable, not with absolute, certainty, yet the position assigned to these songs among, and as forming part of, the several series of authenticated songs, no less than the identity of spirit, character, and individuality, leave little room for doubt; and, as regards the four jeux-partis, the names of the contending trouvères respectively head each alternate verse, thus authenticating the composers beyond dispute. Strange to say, no list has ever been compiled or published of the trouvères who figure in the MS.; and I shall therefore give, at foot, a summary of the several series, enumerating, for the sake of greater clearness, the fourteen unique songs and jeux-partis separately, though, as mentioned above, in the MS. they form part of the series of the respective composers.

Apart from its poetical and musical merits, the Siena MS. claims the privilege of bringing into due prominence no less than ten distinguished trouvères, whom Fétis,* in his list (as recent as 1876) of the leading bards of northern France, ignores altogether; while, on the other hand, three of the trouvères of the Siena MS.—to wit, Guiot de Dijon, Thibaut de Blason, and Prieus de Bouloigne do not figure, as composers, even in the celebrated Vatican collection (1490). No doubt the large number of trouvères and pseudo-trouvères, and of their compositions, good, bad, and indifferent—their name is legion—renders it difficult to draw a hard-and-fast line. But Fétis's list of the trouvères who adorned the twelfth and thirteenth centuries is more than incomplete as long as there are wanting in it such names as Jehan de Grieviler—who was not only a brilliant trouvère, but also an eminent judge of the Puy of Arras, and belonged, moreover, to the flower of Artesian nobility, being styled the "bel chevalier" by so great an authority as Jehan Bretel, the Prince du Puy; or Robert du Chastel, Guillaume and Gilles le Vinier, Thibaut de Blason, Robert de le Pierre, Perrot de Nesle, Philopot Verdier, Gaidifer, Lambert Ferri, and Prieus de Bouloigne. Most, if not all, of these not only gained prizes—that is, were "crowned" for their songs—but, on many occasions on record, were pitted against their great contemporary Jehan Bretel, and must therefore have been deemed worthy of his steel, for a trouvère of his fame and authority would never have condescended to enter the field against second-rate competitors.

Of the fourteen unique compositions, M. Passy has published the text, with the exception of the two songs "Bien doit chanter liement" (No. 25, Grieviler) and "Entre regart e amour e biauté" (No. 45, Robert du Chastel), as also the jeu-parti No. 80, "Jehan très bien amérés," which he has only published in part. The jeu-parti No. 91, between "Sire Prieus de Bouloigne" and Jehan Bretel, one of the best numbers, derives additional interest from the fact that this was the first appearance of Prieus for the purpose of competing with Gérardin, another trouvère from Boulogne, for the honour of representing his native city at the Puy d'Arras. Of the remaining compositions contained in the Siena MS., twenty-six songs (from the series of the King of Navarre, Perrin d'Angecourt, Robert du Chastel, Guillaume le Vinier, and Colart le Bouteillier), and two jeux-partis have been transcribed by various writers from the concordant text of other extant MSS.; so that of a total of a hundred and one compositions of the Siena MS. only thirty-nine numbers, representing about one third, have, so far, been published. And this, be it observed, applies to the text only, for the collection of De Coucy's songs, edited by M. Francisque Michel, is, to my knowledge, the only instance in which a laudable and highly successful effort has, so far, been made to do full justice to the trouvères by publishing, in a modern garb, not only the poetry, but the music to which they sang it.

The merits of that music cannot, of course, be judged by our modern standard of excellence. The airs, in themselves plain and simple, of the trouvères, besides being written in the old notation, often anomalous and hence not always easy to transcribe, are freely charged with that elaborate and arbitrary figuration which, in common with other things, was due to eastern example and influences. But they are the more remarkable when we consider how scanty and limited were the means at the disposal of the trouvères, and that they were composed at a time when music, no less than poetry, had just emerged from six centuries of utter darkness; nay, it may be doubted whether those simple strains, combined with the soft accompaniment of harp and lyre, did not perhaps accord, much more than the clang and clash of our modern compositions, with Jean Jacques Rousseau's most admirable and adequate definition of music as "the art of combining sounds in a manner agreeable to the ear." At all events, as the compositions of the "Minnesänger" and "Meistersänger," whose festivals Wagner has brought so vividly before us in "Tannhäuser" and the "Meistersinger of Nuremberg"; so also the poetry of the trouvères who graced the merry Court of Thibaut of Champagne was in the true sense of the term lyric poetry—viz., it was intended to be sung, and invariably was sung. The great defect of the printed reproductions—and, comparatively speaking, they are few and far between—of that lyric poetry is that, with the exception of Michel's collection, they are incomplete, because they reproduce the text without reproducing the music, and thereby separate that which was intended to be inseparable; in short, they give the letter without the spirit.

CONTENTS OF THE SIENA MS.

Sixty-six Songs.—Fifteen, Thibaut IV., King of Navarre; six, Blondel de Nesle (trouvère of Richard Cœur-de-Lion); one, Gautier de Dargies; four, Jehan de Grieviler; nine, Perrin d'Angecourt; three, Cunelier d'Arras; six, Robert du Chastel; ten, Guillaume le Vinier; one, Guiot de Dijon; one, Thibaut de Blason; nine, Colart le Bouteillier; and one (No. 47), anonymous.

Twenty-one Jeux-partis.—Seven, between Jehan Bretel (Prince du Puy d'Arras) and Lambert Ferri; one, Cunelier and Grieviler; one, Robert de le Pierre and Lambert Ferri; seven, Grieviler and Jehan Bretel; one, Gaidifer and Jehan Bretel; one, Cunelier and Gamars de Villiers; and one, Guillaume and Gilles le Vinier.

On the other hand, the unique compositions, together with the names of the trouvères to whom they must be attributed, are as follows:—

Ten Songs.—25. "Bien doit chanter liement," Jehan de Grieviler; 33. "Ongues à faire chanson," Perrin d'Angecourt; 40. "Jà tant mercis ne sara demourer," 41. "Amours me tient envoisée," 42. "J'ai longement pour ma dame chanté," Cunelier d'Arras; 45. "Entre regart e amour e biauté," 49. "Trop sont li mal cruel à soutenir," 53. "Ben s'est en mon cuer reprise," 51. "A bel servir convient eur avoir," 56. "Tant ai amé, tant aim, tant amcre," Robert du Chastel.

Four Jeux-partis.—80. "Jehan, très bien amérés," Jehan Bretel (Prince du Puy) and Lambert Ferri; 91. "Sire Prieus de Bouloigne," Prieus de Bouloigne and Prince du Puy; 96. "Lambert Ferri, drois es ke m'entremete," Lambert Ferri and Prince du Puy; 97. "Grieviler j'ai grant mestier," Jehan de Grieviler and Prince du Puy. C. P. S.

KEY COLOUR

BY FRANZ GRØENINGS.

THE renewed attempt of the Society of Arts to fix a "Standard Pitch" may bring this vexed question before the musical public again, and as many of the objections to it are based on a wrong conception of so-called "Key colour," a ventilation of this subject in a practical manner may be justified. Discussions on key colour generally go in a circle and leave things as they were before, because opponents argue from different instruments or combinations (voices included) without sometimes even mentioning their respective basis or ignoring their difference, and then they both generalise the observations or impressions received from a certain sound producer.

Key or scale colour in the abstract does not and cannot exist, as there is no key or scale fixed or attainable in nature, and anything that has been said in favour of it was in the mind at least of the speaker or writer deduced from certain sound producers without application to, and verification from, other sources of a different character.

With natural phenomena the pitch of sound varies with the volume and force (or velocity) of the sound producer, and we find that a gradual increase of volume and decrease of velocity or force deepens the sound, and a gradual decrease of the former and increase of the latter raises the sound just as gradually—i.e., the sound from the sea waves and a rippling brook, from the cracking of a carrier's whip and a boy's whip, from an eagle's flight and a swallow's flight, from the fall of a piece of rock and of a pebble, &c.

As regards vocal expressions, the case stands thus: Human beings as well as animals contract in a state of excitement the muscles of the upper part of the body, the natural consequence of which is a slight rising of the larynx, a greater tension of the vocal ligaments, and quicker pulsations, hence a higher pitched voice and quicker time for the expressions of joy, terror, &c., whereas in depression of spirits the same parts become relaxed, and the vocal expressions in grief, &c., lower in pitch and more measured in time. Here again, the same as with natural phenomena, a gradual rising and falling of pitch takes place parallel with the gradations of excitement or depression. This tendency is second nature with us, and requires no tuition; hence no one would entrust a piping male alto voice with the representation of Hamlet's ghost, or a Russian basso profundo with the rôle of a Romeo. Here we have a law of nature if ever there was one, and it will remain one so long as we are constructed as we are; but if our nature changed, so that joy relaxed our muscles, and grief contracted them, we would naturally pitch our expressions in a reverse manner. This natural law excludes key colour in the abstract as generally propounded, because keys assimilated in character are a good deal removed in pitch according to the exponents' showing, and some widely differing in character are close together. Moreover, a marked difference like grief and joy cannot exist in the abstract at a semitone's difference in pitch, otherwise what has been said formerly about, e.g., A flat, would now apply to G, or the present A scale would be endowed with the characteristics of the former B flat. What a nice confusion there would be among the keys "expressive of grief, majesty, joy, pompous or womanly feeling" formerly and now! E major is characterised as "the brightest and most powerful" key, and A major as "redolent of simple genuine cheerfulness." There may be something in this if applied to the piano (the reasons for which I shall show later on), but it cannot be generalised, as according to our law of nature any music in A must impress us as brighter than if performed under the same circumstances a fourth lower (in E). I also find E major endowed with "joy and highest brilliancy," but the next higher F as expressive of "passing regret and mournful feeling." If this were true in the abstract, the consequences might be serious. How perplexing it would be for a midnight serenader, who had forgotten his tuning-fork, to find afterwards that, whereas he meant to touch the tender chords of "womanly feeling," or to express the "wailing of an oppressed and sorrowing heart," he must have roused feelings of anger and contempt through serenading by mistake in a key expressive of "pomp, majesty, and pride!" If key colour in the abstract existed, Mendelssohn's "Barcarole," at the end of the first book of his "Songs without Words," would be heard in the Philharmonic pitch in a key which "adapts itself well to funeral marches!"

In a relative sense key colour exists, but it is artificially produced, and varies according to the characteristics and manipulation of the respective instruments and combinations. How much manipulation can alter the character and effect may be judged from the solitary village bell, which gives notice of church service, and serves as wedding and funeral bell as well; it is the manner of ringing it, not a certain pitch, which informs the neighbourhood unmistakably of its meaning on each occasion. Where a peal of bells is at disposal, it matters not to the bridal pair whether they ring in D or in D flat, and the strongest believer in key colour in the abstract would hardly go to be married in another parish, because the bells in his own are pitched in a scale which some authority or he himself credits with a doleful meaning. Would the Dead March from "Saul" sound to him like a Festival March if a brass band played it with the A crook substituted for the usual B flat crook?

To be correct about relative key colour, we must always be careful not to shift the ground during the argument, but stick to the sound-producer we argue from for the time being.

Let us examine the relative effects of some stringed instruments first.

Berlioz is often misrepresented as an advocate of key colour in the abstract. Those who quote him thus do him the injustice of unwarrantably generalising what he has distinctly expressed as referring to the violin only. He says at the end of the second chapter of his "Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration":—

"Violins are more brilliant and play more easily in keys which leave them the use of the open strings. The key of C alone appears to form an exception to this rule, as regards its sonorosity, which is evidently less than that of the keys of A and E, although it keeps four open strings, while A keeps but three, and E two only.

"The timbre of the various keys for the violin (sic) may be thus characterised, together with their greater or less facility of execution," &c.

Berlioz's observation about the C scale seeming less sonorous or uneven on the violin explains itself, when we consider that in E the tonic and subdominant at any rate are open, namely, the two highest, most penetrating, and most used strings, and that in the keys of A and D the tonic lies as an open note between the open dominant and open subdominant, but that in C neither the tonic nor subdominant is an open note, and the open dominant is only the lowest note, but seldom used, whereas the less important 2nd, 3rd, and 6th of the C scale are open, and the chords in which they occur receive therefrom an undue importance and a preponderance over the tonic, dominant, and subdominant, not given to them in other scales. All these characteristics of the scales on the violin are therefore due to its peculiar uneven construction, and they would disappear if the hard ebony nut, which so firmly determines the beginning of each string at the scroll end, were replaced by one of india-rubber or some soft material of a pressure similar to that of the fleshy finger-ends, which give all the stopped notes a slight vibrato. Had such a thorough master of instrumentation as Berlioz carried his characteristics through the whole treatise, he would have varied them according to the construction and manipulation of each instrument, and even the viola and cello would have received a slightly different treatment to the violin, as the absence of the E string and the addition of a lower string, C, shifts the effect of the open strings in chords and scales in which E and C are important factors.

The A flat movement in Beethoven's C minor Symphony is also often referred to by key colour advocates. With regard to the construction and tonality of the principal instruments employed in it, I may be forgiven in calling it, for explanation's sake, an "Air with Variations for strings," interspersed with short Symphonies in happy contrast by the wind. Beethoven, therefore, had the strings in view in this case, and chose for them the most appropriate key to express what he wanted. If he could hear it played now (in the pitch of A natural in his time) I think it would sound to him just as lovely through the absence of open notes in the string; but if it were played to him now in the real pitch of his time—namely, in G—he would astonish orchestra and conductor with his remarks.* Had it been the custom in his time to tune the string to the pitch of B flat instead of to A natural, I think he would have written it in A natural to produce the effect he desired. We see from this again that, though we may to some extent endow a certain key (in this instance A flat) with a certain characteristic, when played in by a certain group of instruments, one cannot endow the key of A flat in music generally nor in the abstract with that characteristic.

A guitar is more evenly constructed, as the semitones are marked off as firmly as the open strings through cross metal bars the same as the nut, and I doubt whether the finest ear can detect a difference in character if a piece were played on a guitar as it is, and then a semitone higher but with the same fingering, through affixing the "capodaster" before the first cross bar (which virtually means shifting the nut a semitone), because, through this contrivance, character and manipulation in both keys remain exactly the same.

Who would argue for a marked difference in tonality in the accompaniment strings of a zither in any key and a semitone higher, as the notes are all open?

There is also no difference in the harp for the same reason (except the regular gradation up and down, innate in nature as explained in the beginning), provided the harp be tuned in equal temperament, of which more later on, when speaking about organs.

The banjo is endowed with a very hard nut and is fingered similarly to the violin, but it differs a little from the latter through being often operated upon with a metal scraper instead of a bow, and having a piece of pigskin for a sound-board; the strings are also different in number and pitch; slight modifications of the violin characteristics may therefore be expected, and as the said instrument is so mightily manipulated at present, I hope that soon a competent exponent will reveal to its devoted students in which scales to scrape for the various shades of key colour from "manly earnestness" and "deepest religious feeling" to "simple grace" and "passionate intensity!"

* On the violin Berlioz qualifies—

A D = not very difficult, soft; veiled; very noble.

G = easy, rather gay, and slightly commonplace.

Sullivan's "Lost Chord" has been searched for on all instruments, and in keys possessing all manner of characteristics according to abstract key colour advocates, but it has never been found yet. The other day a street piano tried over and over again to grind it out in E natural; round the corner I found a solitary cornet-player before a tavern yearning for it in a most imploring manner in E flat (playing in F on the B flat cornet), and in the next street a boy tried very hard (minus a few accidentals) to get it on a D whistle—all with the same result: it remains lost!

LEISURE to look through our collection of "Curiosities of Criticism" once more enables us to present our readers with a few specimens. At a Concert which, it is said, commenced with "an orchestral overture from the 'Bohemian Girl,'" we are told that a "pianoforte solo 'Concertstück' was played by a lady amateur." Regarding this composition, the critic says, "We must own to a suspicion that the piece was not 'Concertstück' pure and simple, as we thought we could detect strains from 'Oberon' running through it, and fragments of other well-known numbers. The introduction did not detract from the performance, but it rendered it unusually long, and apparently tired out the clever pianist." Another item is thus spoken of, "The chorus, 'Fair land, we greet thee,' was a splendid chorus, and, notwithstanding the palpable want of variety in the voices, there being, as far as we could judge, an almost total absence of tenors and contraltos, the number was one of the gems of the evening." In a notice of the performance of Haydn's "Creation," one vocalist is said to have been "chaste and discriminating to the full of those adjectives," and another to have shown, in rendering the "Introduction and Recitative" to the third part of the Oratorio, "a knowledge of nice distinctions in themes, and the power to exhibit them," the accompanist to the work being credited with "exact and responsive playing." Another writer, in a criticism upon "The Messiah," thinks that "But who may abide" is "rather heavy," and would like the obligato to "The Trumpet shall sound" to be played with the "trumpet alone." In conclusion, we read that one of the examiners appointed by an Academic Board was "Mr. H. J. Stark, Mossbank, Oxon.," and that at a Church Service the music was Redhead's Creed and "the rest of the Service 'Battiste's calkin.'" We leave these little puzzles to be unravelled by the well-known professors to whom they undoubtedly apply.

SOME very pertinent and sensible remarks appeared in the Globe of the 18th ult., concerning nationality in music. They were inspired by the immense and undoubted triumph of English art at the recent Leeds Festival, and so aimed as to combat the absurd notion that there is a kind of "Jingoism" in standing up for native talent. A spirit of self-appreciation has, we rejoice to say, lately appeared in this country as regards music. We no longer decry the efforts of our own people. Talent amongst us has, at last, fair play. It is invited to come out of holes and corners, and show what it can do in the presence of a sympathetic public. All this implies an immense gain to the prospects of English music, yet, from time to time, we hear protests against it. Voices cry out that music knows no country, and that we should cordially welcome musical talent, come whence it may. The people who talk like this do not seem able to distinguish between things that differ. Their protest is per se unassailable, but it does not happen to apply. We shall always, it is to be hoped, have a welcome for foreign talent—if it be superior to our own, and we can derive benefit therefrom. If we have talent as good, or better, in our own ranks, then we mean to be guided by the maxim "charity begins at home." In this Germany sets an example. Some years ago, when our foremost violinist, Mr. Carrodus, wished to make an artistic tour on Teutonic soil, he was advised to stay in England, because the Germans did not want him. The tables apparently will soon be turned, and our foreign friends be made to know that we are no longer dependent upon them for our musical supply. The Leeds Festival, essentially English as it was, emphasised the change that has taken place, and the organs of public opinion do good service when, like the Globe, they draw attention to it.

ONE more attempt is to be made to remove the disgrace under which England has lain for the last 190 years in suffering the greater part of the compositions of her greatest composer to remain unpublished. Germany has given us monumental editions of Palestrina, Bach, Handel, Mozart, and Beethoven, Belgium is busy with the publication of the works of Grétry, and even Holland has lately bestirred itself to revive the forgotten name of Sweelinck, while England has remained satisfied that Purcell should be little more than a name among us. The Purcell Society, which was founded in 1876, has only published two works in the ten years of its existence, and since 1882 has given no signs of life. But the circular issued last month shows that the Society has only slumbered, and is not, as most of its members must have imagined, defunct. According to this document, the continuation of the publications was prevented by the difficulty of finding editors; but this has now been surmounted by the generous offer of Mr. W. H. Cummings, who is willing to undertake the sole labour of preparing Purcell's works for publication—no light undertaking, when it is remembered that at least twenty-seven odes and forty-five operas, besides an immense amount of Church music, remain to be published. The success of the undertaking now rests solely with the public, and there ought to be no difficulty in obtaining a sufficient number of subscribers who are willing to pay a guinea a year for the honour of England's reputation as a musical country.

DR. STAINER'S Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" was performed at Special Festival Services at St. Marylebone Parish Church, on the 20th and 27th ult., under the direction of the composer. In a brief address delivered by the Rector, the mighty power of music to kindle religious feelings was dwelt upon in eloquent terms. The seed sown by the Dean of Gloucester in his memorable sermon at the recent Festival is already beginning to bear rich fruit.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

THE MUSICAL TIMES for October contained descriptive and partly critical notices in advance of the five new works produced at Leeds on the 13th and three following days of the same month. We have now to act the part of a chronicler, and lay before our readers—with due regard for their patience and the space at command—an important chapter in contemporaneous musical history.

There are certain respects in which one Leeds Festival so closely resembles another that brief words regarding them serve to convey all that is needed. Thus we need not be precise concerning the executive force gathered together under the leadership of Sir Arthur Sullivan. Everybody understands that it was large (440 performers); that the orchestra, numbering over 100 players, consisted of the best available men, nearly all of them Englishmen, with a Yorkshireman (Mr. Carrodus) at their head; that the chorus of more than 300 picked voices had for long been under the careful training of Mr. Alfred Broughton, and that engagements were made with excellent solo vocalists, including Mesdames Albani, Williams, Hutchinson, Patey, Wilson, Damian, Messrs. Lloyd, McKay, McGuckin, King, Brereton, Mills, and Santley. The resources, in point of fact, were complete and, perhaps, the best of their kind that money could buy. Nothing less was expected; nothing less would have been excused under the conditions of a Festival in the midst of a wealthy community, where large profits are certain to be made. One feature in the arrangements deserves special note. We refer to their thoroughly English character. Apart from three or four artists in the orchestra, such as Mr. Svendsen and Mr. Lebon, everybody concerned represented native talent. In a sense, we do not except Madame Albani, who may stand for the Greater Britain beyond the sea, and who is a born subject of the Queen. Looking at the result achieved, we say that the almost exclusive nationality of the Leeds Festival, in its executive capacity, should be a source of patriotic pride. The most cautious connoisseur might have backed that chorus and orchestra and those soloists against the world, with a certainty of not imperiling his judgment. This should teach us to rely more upon ourselves than we have done. We want no "protection"—no coddling of native art to its own injury; but we do urge at least a fair regard for the talent which springs up within our borders. It should have our first attention and, other things being equal, our preference.

After two days of exhausting rehearsal, which told heavily upon the female chorus, public work began (Wednesday, the 13th ult.) with Handel's "Israel in Egypt." There was a large attendance, the Victoria Hall being full in every part. This was the rule throughout the week, but had the first gathering proved exceptionally big we should have said "No wonder." Yorkshire folk love Handel with unabated love. To parody Tennyson's couplet:—

Men may come and men may go,
But he goes on for ever.

Handel is the one unchanging fashion of the great northern county. Its musical population are reared upon the Saxon-English master's strong meat, and from the custom of their youth they never think of departing. "Israel" was, of course, a happy choice. It brought the chorus into play in connection with music of the broad and massive character which the genius of Yorkshire singers best loves, and it enabled the entire executive to start with a coup de théâtre which could hardly fail to exercise an influence upon the rest of the week. We should say that nearly all anticipations of good results were realised in the performance. It is true that the female divisions of the chorus fell somewhat short of what was expected. There was less volume of sound than ordinary, and the attack was sometimes wanting in confidence and readiness. But later experience showed this to have been partly due to the excessive labour of the previous days. Many of the ladies appeared to be quite young, and lacking the full physical development of womanhood. Hence they were fatigued by the strain of arduous work executed with enthusiasm; and a tired chorister is certain to fail in precisely the respects noted above. On the other hand, the basses were magnificent—beyond hope of improvement; while the tenors, though with a strong admixture of baritone quality, ran them close in the race for supremacy. All this the chain of choruses in "Israel" made clear, but it is a question whether, beyond professional critics, anybody cared to do more than enjoy an imposing ensemble, and marvel at the genius of a mighty composer. The solos were safe in the hands of Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Brereton, and Mr. Santley. They were, however, completely dwarfed by the colossal choruses—even more dwarfed, we think, than at the Handel Festivals. A novel feature in the performance was the speed at which Sir Arthur Sullivan took many of the numbers. The entire first part of the Oratorio was got through in forty-five minutes, the gain in time being proportionate throughout. Sir Arthur may be credited with a good reason for what he did, and we are ready to admit that the more scholastic choruses, such as "And believed the Lord," benefited by extra speed. Many of the more descriptive numbers, however, lost in dignity and grandeur to an appreciable extent. At any rate, that is our opinion upon a matter which, no doubt, comes within the range of individual taste.

The evening Concert was made notable by the production of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Story of Sayid" under the composer's personal direction. This was the Scottish musician's first appearance in Leeds, and some curiosity was felt as to the reception which his music would obtain. Mr. Mackenzie has a style of his own—one which demands a measure of familiarity in order to perfect comprehension and appreciation. Wherefore, the cognoscenti were not unprepared for a certain degree of hesitancy on the part of an unaccustomed public—hesitancy quite free from the smallest element of disapproval, and born of contact with a manner and method scarcely at first understood. The "argument" of the "Story of Sayid," and some remarks upon the general character of the music, having already appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES, we may pass on to the impressions created by the performance upon those previously familiar with the composer's works. Mr. Mackenzie's present transition state was marked even more strongly than we looked for, but the change is, in most respects, a modification rather than an abandonment. Throughout the work the composer's distinctive style so appears as that none can mistake it. The general principles of his orchestration happily remain unaffected; the character of his melodies has undergone no transformation, and the peculiarities of accent and rhythm, always so large an element in original expression, are as easily traced as ever. Such change as the "Story of Sayid" exemplifies lies in an approach to greater simplicity of outline, directness of utterance, and symmetry of form. In these respects, we see Mr. Mackenzie gravitating towards the classical masters, while retaining his original characteristics in other respects. We trust that the movement will continue, with due caution to the end of preserving individual qualities. It is our opinion, after deliberate thought upon the matter, that Mr. Mackenzie may gain by a further advance towards simplicity, above all in his airs and vocal solos. These are still somewhat over-elaborated, and wanting in definiteness. Should they, in the composer's next work, share more freely the modifications which have so vastly improved his choral music, we may be able to say that the transition stage has passed, that the gifted musician has found his exact metier, and that the lesson of experience and accumulated observation, missed by so many others, has been well learned by him. The foregoing are all the general remarks called for in addition to those previously made, and now we pass on to notice the particular numbers which, in performance, commended themselves to observation. Among these was the opening chorus, "Alas! our land is desolate," with its attractive "local colour" and strong, though restrained, expression. The orchestral part in this chorus is a fine study of means well adapted to a particular and unusual end. Without being imitative, it is beautifully suggestive. In other words, it keeps along the higher plane of art, and makes us conscious of locality without stooping to actual reproduction. In the dialogue between the crowd and the Watchman, and subsequently, between the crowd and the Horseman, the benefit of Mr. Mackenzie's newly acquired directness and terseness was especially felt. The words pass rapidly and with impetus, strengthened by music of plain outline and simple character. So should all such scenes be treated. In them we do not want the elaboration of art but an approach to the natural language of strong and excited feeling. We feel the utterances of Mr. Mackenzie's crowd to be true and just. The dramatic here takes precedence of the musical, so far, at any rate, as absolutely to control expression. In the following chorus the composer's full strength produced a lively effect upon the audience. Here again, the means employed are plain and direct, while the dramatic feeling is forcibly conveyed. The section which invokes Siva, the "Stern Destroyer," could not, in these respects, be improved. The method is as clear as daylight, and the spirit force to intensity. Another good impression was made by the Triumphant March, wherein we meet with more local suggestiveness in combination with accepted musical form, and yet another by the impressive solo, with choral response, "Thou hast come as a pestilence in the night." In fact, the whole of the scene, from this point to the end of the first part, has claims upon warm regard. Sayid's solo "Where sets the sun" is a masterful effort, full of beauty and power; an admirable companion to it being found in that for Ilmas, "First of his Prophet's warriors be," although some may object, perhaps, that here we have elaboration in excess of requirement. The short chorus "Release him not," and the repeated invocation of Siva, give choral importance to this section of the work, which proceeds to its end without a moment's droop in the high flight undertaken by the composer. At the close of the first part, the attitude of the audience was sympathetic, but not demonstrative. All present were interested, without quite comprehending the language addressed to them. In this respect the second part opened more successfully, warm applause following the chorus for female voices, "Sweet the balmy days of Spring." This number is a gem of beauty and refinement which can never fail to extort admiration from the most reluctant audience. It will soon be detached from its setting and presented as a separate piece in numberless class-rooms and concert-halls. Ilmas's great air, "O Love, thy car triumphal," attracted nearly equal attention for the breadth of its style and the force of its expression, while the scene in which Sawa bids his daughter prepare for death, held the audience by its dramatic strength. The climax came with the last scene of all, introduced by a solemn march that deserves a place in the foremost ranks of its order. Mr. Mackenzie has written nothing more impressive, while, at the same time, he has helped effect by a measure of original means. For example, the leading theme is first stated by the bass strings and bassoons, the only accompaniment being the whirr of a muffled side drum. Its final enunciation, where the brass instruments force it through the noise of the entire orchestra, is a startling and effective contrast. But, indeed, the entire number belongs to the good things of art. It appropriately leads up to the intensely dramatic situation in which Ilmas is saved, at the last moment, by Sayid's return. Mr. Mackenzie has written this with unusual "grip." Helped by the inherent interest of the scene, his music excites an almost painful degree of interest, and forces the duller imagination to picture every action of the characters concerned. The Leeds audience were certainly thus affected. A profound stillness and silence reigned amongst them, till the rhythmic beat of hoofs announced the coming of the Arab. Then a stir of relief was visible over the entire hall, and paid the highest compliment to the musician's power. The elegant and graceful duet, "Noble maiden, low before thee," and the well-developed final chorus, "O Love, thy car triumphal," brought the Cantata to an end in perfect keeping with all that had gone before, and helped to evoke a demonstration which, if not beyond measure enthusiastic, showed how favourably the composer, despite that in him which was unfamiliar, had impressed his hearers. Mr. Mackenzie was heartily cheered, and compelled to return to the platform to be cheered again. The performance reflected much credit upon all concerned, but especially upon Madame Albani, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Watkin Mills, by whom the solo characters were sustained. If we do not dwell upon the efforts of these artists, it is because a better opportunity will soon present itself. Enough now that they did admirably well. The chorus and orchestra were excellent throughout, and contributed their full share to the satisfactory result. Following the Cantata came a selection of five pieces from Mozart's "Idomeneo"; a capital part-song "The days of long ago," by Berthold Tours; Mr. H. Leslie's madrigal, "Thine eyes so bright," and the Overture to "Euryanthe." The purely vocal pieces were conducted by Mr. Alfred Broughton, who had a warm reception in acknowledgment of his success as trainer of the choir.

The work for the second morning was Bach's Mass in B minor, which imposed a sufficiently arduous task upon a chorus not then recovered from the fatigues of rehearsal.

Sir Arthur Sullivan evidently aimed at a "monumental" performance, and may now congratulate himself upon having given the most complete interpretation of Bach's sacred masterpiece ever heard in this country, or, for that matter, any other. The completeness referred to arose largely from a close adherence to the composer's idea. Nothing was "cut" from the work, no additional accompaniments were introduced, and all the requirements of the score were rigorously observed. To this end neither expense nor trouble was spared. That the original trumpet parts might be played as written, the trumpets were expressly made on the old German model and placed in the capable hands of Messrs. Morrow, McGrath, and Ellis; two oboi d'amore were borrowed from the Bach Society and played by Messrs. Lebon and Horton; while Mr. Mann undertook the difficult solo for corno da caccia which is usually played on a clarinet. By way of supplementing the whole, Mr. Cliffe arranged a special organ part, under Sir Arthur Sullivan's supervision, the upshot being that the Leeds audience, more favoured than London amateurs, heard the old Cantor's music with all the effects intended by the great man who wrote it. Those who favour additional accompaniments and the modernising of ancient works may suppose that the result of Sir Arthur Sullivan's "purism" was baldness and poverty. Nothing of the sort. We were conscious of naught wanting to completeness. Bach knew how to obtain results perfect in their way with the means at his disposal, and hence, besides truth of interpretation, we had, at Leeds, a finished thing, in the style of a past day it is true, but satisfactory even now. The magnificent choruses, though uncoloured by modern instrumentation, made a great effect, and were splendidly given. Put upon their mettle by the difficulties of a severe task, the chorus singers rose to the occasion, and actually performed best that which was most exacting. The ensemble in such numbers as "Et resurrexit" and the "Sanctus" attained the sublime—there is no other word by which to describe it—so grandly were the passages sustained. It seemed that the choir became, for the time, an immense organ, plus all that raises the human voice above the noblest of instruments. Naturally, this made an impression upon the audience, even upon those to whom Bach is ordinarily a Dryasdust, and it was interesting to note the sustained attention which the long work received down to the very last chord. The solos were entrusted to Miss Anna Williams, Miss Damian, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Santley. They were not, on the whole, very satisfactory, and suffered more than usual by contrast with the glorious choral numbers. Sir Arthur Sullivan conducted, and occasionally showed a disposition again to depart from usage in the matter of speed. As a rule, however, the Conductor hit upon a tempo to which no objection could be taken, thus crowning his successful efforts on behalf of justice to one of the greatest works ever given to art by heaven-sent genius.

Thursday evening's Concert brought, by way of novelty, Mr. Stanford's setting of Tennyson's "Revenge," with the general character of which readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES are already acquainted. The effect of this fine and bold composition more than justified anticipatory remarks—it more than justified, also, the use to which the author put his ballad-like themes. We have not often met, in music, with a happier and, at the same time, more daring thought than that carried out by Mr. Stanford when he employed melodies redolent of the sea, and smacking unmistakably of the fore-castle. These, it is needless to say, have been glorified in their setting and treatment, but they bear the process well, retaining enough of their original character to serve for colouring and localising purposes. The more descriptive parts of the Choral Ballad, such as the battle, and events immediately following, came out with force and grandeur, and the whole made an impression which should secure for Mr. Stanford a sympathetic hearing when next he appeals to the judgment of the Leeds Festival public. The composer, who conducted in person, was warmly congratulated upon a frank success, but not with more effusion than the merits of the case justified. Beethoven's Symphony in C minor followed the new work; and the second part of the programme was wholly taken up by Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night." We may dismiss these familiar things with a general commendation of their performance, and a special word of acknowledgment for Miss Damian, Mr. McKay, and Mr. Brereton, to whom the solos in Mendelssohn's Cantata were entrusted. There was again a very large audience, limited, like all others during the week, only by the size of the hall.

After two new compositions by a Scotchman and an Irishman respectively, the time had come for foreign talent to assert itself. This was done on Friday morning, when Antonín Dvořák's specially-written Oratorio, "St. Ludmila," made its first appeal for the favour of a critical audience. Much interest seemed to be felt in the occasion, not only by local amateurs, among whom Dvořák made his début, but also among those familiar with the man and his music. The question was whether the line of great oratorio composers would be continued by the Bohemian master, and, surely, no moot point could assume greater importance in the eyes of Englishmen. We are a nation of oratorio lovers, and feel more concern for that class of art-work than for any other. Much, therefore, hung upon the result. Readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES are acquainted with the nature of the story set forth in "St. Ludmila," and also with the broader features of the music. In the issue for October it was said, "He (Dvořák) would seem, also, to have noted the particular forms of choral music most in harmony with English tastes. . . . In some numbers he even seems to be emulous of Handel, and goes as straight to the mark, with as much plainness and directness as ever did the old master. So far, this is a decided change in Dvořák's style, due, no doubt, to his experience in England." These words fairly point out the most salient feature in "St. Ludmila." We see there a curious and interesting series of reflected styles, as though the composer, in his anxiety to adopt the best, marshalled in review all that had any claim to be chosen. It may be open to doubt whether the composer would not have done better to follow the promptings of his own genius, and write as he had written in his earlier and more distinctive works. But this is a question which does not now come up for discussion. We have to do with "St. Ludmila" as we find it, and particularly to note that though we recognise Handel, Mendelssohn, and others in the work, we see them through the medium of Dvořák—a medium strong enough to tinge them with its own individuality. Dvořák is a musician of powerful characteristics. He could never convey to us that which is not his own, just as a pane of clear white glass allows rays of light to pass through. In this sense he is painted glass, and the light, in transmission, becomes tinted. Hence of whatever master he reminds us in this work, we are much more conscious of himself, and the combination is often piquant and attractive. The more observant among the Leeds audience were interested in noting the fact just stated; but, perhaps, the impression most easily received was to the effect that nowhere in "St. Ludmila" does Dvořák lose his powerful grip of the subject and of his resources. We may feel that the master should have been more true to himself on certain points; here he is the very man we know and no other. There is a virile force in the music, the influence of which cannot but be felt. It takes hold of us with a giant's grasp, and carries us along despite of struggles to be free and critical. It would be interesting to analyse that force did space permit; but we must be content to indicate free and changeful orchestration, all aglow with colour; strenuous, even impetuous melody, instinct with the spirit of feeling as well as of beauty, which gives tune its vital strength; and an acute sense of climax, which invariably keeps the composer from travelling too long on a level. Dvořák's music is always working up to a commanding eminence, and no sooner arrives there than it starts for another and a higher, making every step of immediate interest by free, bold harmonies that seem to open up a new vista each minute. These qualities account for the hold obtained, and maintained, by the Oratorio over its first audience. "St. Ludmila" is long, but it was not too long for the patience of Leeds. The work had an attentive hearing from first to last, and the fact may be taken as an indication of the fate that awaits it throughout the country. The performance was conducted by the composer, Mr. Dvořák making his first bow to a Leeds audience amid flattering indications of the heartiest welcome. He found reason to be well satisfied with his interpreters, since they had really mastered by no means easy music. Once, it is true, in a passage of special uncertainty as to key, there were evidences of confusion in the choral ranks, but the crisis rapidly passed, and all was safe. The general result presented a claim to unstinted admiration, for look at the difficulties of the task! Mr. Dvořák has little mercy upon executants. He calls them to wander with him through a labyrinth of tonality, dodging and shifting, turning and winding, till the thread of key-relationship is retained with the utmost difficulty. Honour, therefore, to the Leeds chorus for the manful way in which they faced the ordeal, and the success with which they came out of it. The superb orchestra did its duty no less well, and the solo vocalists were heart and soul in their task. Madame Albani (Ludmila) especially exerted herself to perfect the representation as regards her important part. Her rendering of the simple and simply beautiful air, "I long, with child-like longing," and of the more important, "O grant me in the dust to fall," was the perfection alike of vocalism and expression. But all she did was well done—done with the intense devotion, which is the secret of success in most endeavours. Madame Patey had scarcely so grateful a part, much of Svatava's music needing change to bring it within the compass of her voice. But so experienced an artist could not fail of good effect; which, by the way, resulted in abundant measure from her delivery of the important recitative and air, "Within what gloomy depths." Mr. Lloyd was all himself in the part of Borivoj, though his greatest success was made, perhaps, in the character of the Peasant, who sings "Come, let us garlands bring." As for Mr. Santley, it will be understood that he gave the declamatory strains of Ivan with just emphasis and vocal power. The music, in this case, is not what a singer best loves; but a true artist like Mr. Santley does his utmost with whatever the composer puts into his hands. At the close of the performance, customary demonstrations took place. These may not mean much, since they are invariable, and if we were asked to point out more trustworthy evidence of approval, we should certainly indicate the patience and attention with which a crowded audience sat out the Oratorio.

The programme of Friday evening was the least satisfactory of the Festival, being of a very miscellaneous character. On another occasion the Committee will do well to imitate their compeers at Birmingham, and abolish altogether the olla podrida which was once thought necessary to give the Feast a popular element. Nevertheless, there were good things in the scheme. By way of proof it suffices to mention Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor ("Scotch"), Schumann's "Advent Hymn"—albeit, not very characteristic of the composer—the Overture to "Der Fliegende Holländer," and a Ballet Suite made up of selections from the works of Sullivan, Bizet, Delibes, and Gounod. The choir sang Bishop's "Tramp, tramp," and Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. F. King contributed solos of a more or less "stock" character. The attendance was again very large.

In popular regard, Saturday took rank as "the great day of the Feast," for then Sir Arthur Sullivan's Cantata, "The Golden Legend," was produced. That the public should have set their heart upon this work is not to be wondered at. The composer's name stands for everything pleasing and graceful in music, and when he comes forward with a new expression of his art, amateurs in general do not approach it dubiously, but with minds made up for gratification. Hence it was that the Yorkshire people crowded to "The Golden Legend" in numbers large enough to fill the hall twice over, and in spirit quite ready to pay a guinea for standing room just within the door. This explains to some extent the per-fervid reception given to Sir Arthur's new work. People can generally see what they wish to see, and, in all probability, had "The Golden Legend" been a mediocre production instead of a very good one, the bulk of the audience would have gone home quite satisfied. "Give a dog a bad name," says an old proverb, "and he is half hanged." The reverse of the adage holds good, and "nothing succeeds like success." So much the better for Sir Arthur Sullivan, who, we should remember, has had to earn the repute that now serves him so well. A special result flowed from the state of things just pointed out. Not only were the sympathies of the public enlisted, but those of the performers also. Favoured by the attractive character of the music, all concerned, from the humblest chorus singer to the prima donna, felt stimulated to highest effort, and the consequence was a faultless rendering of the new piece. Never did composer enjoy greater advantage than Sir Arthur Sullivan at Leeds. Everything worked to his good, and to the end of a triumph. We need add little to the remarks made in last month's MUSICAL TIMES upon this subject; but it should be said without delay that passages in the Cantata which seemed, at first sight, rather tame, came out all right in performance. There is hardly a page that we would wish away, and very few points that appear to us misjudged. On the other hand, an adequate rendering of the work accentuated the merit of features to which attention was called in our preliminary notice. The pervading spirit is one of charm. In every scene, and in dealing with no matter what situation or feeling, Sir Arthur has contrived to associate musical beauty with truth of expression. We do not forget that the subject and the lyrics exactly suited his genius. They fitted him "like a glove." But this detracts in no measure from the credit of a result the most complete, in its way, that the recent history of music has to show. But besides beauty there is strength in "The Golden Legend." Of this, both the Prologue and the Epilogue give proof—the one by its vigorous and picturesque tone-painting, the other by its solid construction. Sir Arthur here shows that he is the musician of more than tender and delicate sentiment. He can rouse us with the trumpet as well as lull us with the lute. And then, all his results are gained by means comparatively simple. He trusts little to mere noise and vehemence, to great splashes of colour and extreme contrasts of light and shade. These things are for the men who cannot call upon resources more subtle and artistic. Sir Arthur Sullivan trusts to pure vocal melody, symmetrical and tuneful, and to orchestration, which largely depends upon the deft handling of a few instruments so as to make full use of their individual characteristics. The orchestra with him is never monotonous, because he economises its effects and finds them serve for variety all through a long work. Too many others pour out its wealth upon the first few pages, and discover very soon that they have been guilty of "wasteful and ridiculous excess." But the impression made by "The Golden Legend" cannot be traced wholly to technical sources. The chief charm lies in the apt and natural expression of feelings engendered in a sensitive nature by the incidents of the subject. Sir Arthur has felt his theme, and given unaffected utterance to his emotions. Here is the grand secret of all artistic success, and, apart from it, no mere piling up of "effects" drawn from the machinery of music can avail in the slightest degree. We have already characterised the performance in general terms, and now must refer more particularly to the perfect manner in which Madame Albani (Elsie) and Mr. Lloyd (Prince Henry) discharged the important tasks allotted them. Both artists were fitted to the utmost nicety with a sympathetic part, and both equalled, if they did not transcend, the best of previous efforts. The climax was reached in the beautiful duet sung on the Terrace of Vautsberg. Each singer had an opportunity there, and each made the most of it. Madame Patey (Ursula) also left her mark on the Cantata by vocalism which exhibited perfect propriety and finished execution. The little Mr. Watkin Mills had to do was done well, and Mr. F. King (Lucifer), though overweighted here and there, sang with spirit and a measure of characteristic expression which was favourably commented on. The scene at the close of the performance was extraordinary for enthusiasm. Cheering, handkerchief-waving, flower throwing were the order of the moment. All was deserved.

The first part of "St Paul" followed, with Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Watkin Mills as principal soloists. This may be dismissed, for reasons of space, with a tribute to general and, in the case of the artists just-named, particular excellence.

On Saturday evening the Festival closed with a fine performance of "Elijah," in which Miss Williams, Madame Patey, Miss Damian, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley took part. All went well, and a crowded house expressed cordial approval, particularly of Mr. Santley's share in the work.

The popular baritone seemed to have called upon his full powers for the occasion.

Now our long story comes to an end, winding up with acknowledgments of the great energy, forethought, and skill shown by the Conductor; the admirable way in which band, chorus, and principals worked for the common good; the steady support accorded by the Yorkshire public; and the confidence shown by the managers in the resources of their own countrymen. For the sake of completeness it may be added that Dr. Spark and Mr. Cliffe shared the duty of presiding at the grand organ, and well discharged their task.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE usual short autumn season of these Concerts began in St. James's Hall on the 23rd ult., under auspicious conditions, if these may be estimated by the size and favourable attitude of the audience. There was not, it is true, quite the measure of enthusiasm generally shown by Mr. Richter's supporters when works of the Wagner-Liszt school are in question; but the season had only just begun, and some time is necessary for settling down into the groove from which the holidays lifted even fanatics for music. Concerning what was done at the opening Concert, there is no need to say much; the programme having been made up of stock pieces played, under Mr. Richter's bâton, we will not say ad nauseam, but, of a truth, to satiety. The selection began with the "Kaisermarsch" of Wagner, after which came a "Faust" Overture, Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Préludes"; the Introduction to "Parsifal," and the "Ride of the Valkyrie," Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony bringing up the rear. All these are fairly representative things, and there can be no objection to their repeated rendering. At the same time, a little more catholicity might be desirable in the interest of music generally. The performance offered little opportunity for criticism. Mr. Richter's orchestra could, probably, have played much of the music without book, and by this time they are familiar with the slightest wish of their able Conductor. Hence, as a natural result, an almost perfect ensemble.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

For the very obvious reason that nobody, not even a musical critic, can be in Leeds and London at the same time, we are unable to say more of the opening Saturday Concert at the Palace than can be gathered from a perusal of the programme. A Spanish ballet from "Le Cid" (Massenet) constituted the orchestral novelty of the performance, while a singer new to Sydenham audiences was heard in Mlle. Ella Russell, whose choice of songs was well calculated to display that vocal dexterity which has won her credit at Covent Garden. Miss Fanny Davies was heard in the Pianoforte Concerto of Schumann, in the interpretation of whose works this young lady never fails to recall the style and touch of her great mistress, as well as in some minor pieces. The Symphony was Beethoven's in C (No. 1), and Sterndale Bennett's ever welcome "Naiads" Overture served as a lever du rideau. In view of the close proximity of the anniversary of Liszt's birth, the second Concert took the shape of an in memoriam homage to the Hungarian master, of whose compositions the programme was almost entirely made up, the two exceptions being Siegfried's Funeral March from the "Götterdämmerung," with which the performance opened in most appropriate and impressive fashion, and the Vorspiel to "Parsifal." The lack of scenic accessories in the case of the former piece was strikingly made up in the minds of many present by the thoughts and memories suggested by the occasion and the surroundings, while the devotional character of the famous Vorspiel rendered it eminently suitable for inclusion in such a programme, apart from the intimate and historic connection between Liszt and Wagner. Of the two "Symphonic Poems" given on this occasion [No. 3, "Les Préludes," and No. 12, "The Ideals" (after Schiller)], the former, by its episodes of tranquil pastoral charm, and the latter by its stormy passion, produced an equally powerful impression on an unusually appreciative and sympathetic audience. The engagement of Mr. Walter Bache to represent his master at the pianoforte—a natural tribute to the unswerving loyalty of Liszt's most devoted English disciple—was most happily justified by the skill and energy of his playing in the A major Concerto, and the excessively brilliant Hungarian Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra, better known in its purely orchestral setting as one of the most favourite pieces in Mr. Richter's répertoire. Not the least enjoyable feature of an interesting programme was the singing by Mrs. Henschel of "S'il est un charmant gazou," an exquisite little song, exquisitely sung, and "Comment," disaïent-ils," in both of which the lyrical charm of Victor Hugo's words has gained in the setting. Mr. Henschel, besides accompanying his wife in masterly fashion, gave a dignified and intellectual rendering of the sombre ballade "Die Vätergruft," nor was he less successful in interpreting the resignation and aspiration which are the underlying sentiments of "Ueber allen Gipfeln" and "Jugendglück" respectively.

Our readers hardly need to be reminded of the important new departure which the Directors, "guided by the results of former seasons," have resolved to take this winter, by giving greater prominence to choral music than has hitherto been the case. Thus, all the chief Leeds novelties are announced for performance on a scale befitting their importance, under the conductorship of their respective composers, and with the co-operation of the choir of Novello's Oratorio Concerts. Finally, a word of notice is due to the recent publication of a catalogue of the principal instrumental and choral works performed at the Saturday Concerts from October, 1855, to May, 1886, prefaced by some interesting remarks from the pen of Mr. Manns, and arranged in a form excellently adapted for purposes of reference.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

WE have now fairly commenced our musical season. All our choral societies are in full activity of rehearsal, and a little excitement prevails with regard to the prospect of novelties and attractive programmes.

Since Mr. Carl Rosa's very short visit, Mr. Mapleson has brought hither a corps, announced as "Her Majesty's Opera Company," including our old friends Madame Lablache, Mdlle. Bauermeister, Signori del Puente, Runcio, and Ciampi. Among the newer artists we have Mdles. Fohstrom, Lilian Nordica, Jenny Broch, and Helene Hastroiter, the Conductor being the experienced Ardit. Among the round of well-known operas given, we have had Rossini's "Il Barbiere," Donizetti's "La Favorita," and "Lucia di Lammermoor," Bellini's "Sonnambula," Verdi's "Traviata," and Gounod's "Faust." "Don Giovanni" was announced for the 29th ult. Wagner's "Lohengrin" has proved very attractive, although not exhibiting the resources of the company to the best advantage. Altogether the patronage has been liberal enough to encourage the undertaking, which has been conducted with considerable spirit. Some of the younger ladies have pleased very much.

Mr. de Jong commenced his series of Fortnightly Orchestral and Star Concerts on the 9th ult., aided by a party of vocalists, including Miss Mary Davies and Madame Patey, Messrs. Sidney Tower, Bevan, and Barrington Foote; and by Herr Poznanski (of the Paganini school), and Signor Mattei, a pianist well liked at the Saturday evening gatherings. The band opened with a spirited rendering of the Overture to "Der Freischütz," and gave several pleasing selections during the evening. For his second Concert Mr. de Jong engaged Miss Siedle, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Arthur Rousby, and Mr. Sims Reeves; and for an extra Concert, on Friday evening, the 29th ult., Madame Adelina Patti was announced as the chief attraction. Alternately with his fortnightly Subscription Concerts, Mr. de Jong will superintend the cheaper entertainments supplied chiefly by our local vocalists, by military bands, &c., and called "Working Men's Concerts."

The first part of Liszt's "St. Elizabeth" will be repeated by the Athenæum Musical Society, under Dr. Henry Hiles, at the opening (1st inst.) of its twentieth season.

The Vocal Society, under Mr. H. Watson, Mus.B., gave its first Subscription Concert, in the Concert Hall, on Wednesday, the 20th ult., and deserved a better audience. But on the previous Monday evening Mr. Watson had introduced his choir at the Free Trade Hall, in conjunction with Dr. J. F. Bridge, who skilfully exhibited the most effective parts of the very ineffective organ.

Among the most interesting of our musical doings must be chronicled Mr. F. Lamond's Pianoforte Recital, on Wednesday, the 13th ult. Mr. Lamond undertook a very exacting programme, including Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 111), Brahms's Twenty-eight Variations on a Theme by Paganini, Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," a "Romance" of his own composition, the "Don Juan" Fantaisie, and other transcriptions by Liszt, and a varied selection from Chopin's works. Evidently the chief desire of the young pianist was to exhibit a mastery over the keyboard, remarkable in so young a player. In that, as well as in copying Rubinstein's trick of plunging out of one piece into another (without affording breathing or digesting time to the audience), increased experience will naturally guide aright Mr. Lamond; from whom, in the future, very much may fairly be expected.

Of course, the forthcoming Jubilee Exhibition, for which extensive arrangements are being made at Old Trafford, is exciting a constantly increasing interest. Whatever may come of the ship canal scheme, the heart of the Manchester people will be warmly interested in making the Exhibition a success. Provision for the entertainment of the visitors is being zealously provided. It is announced that at the opening ceremony Mr. Hallé will take charge of the music; and it may be expected that he will not allow those under his guidance to be insulted as, at Liverpool, music was snubbed. A semi-military band, under Mr. de Jong, will discourse twice daily. Different military bands will be specially engaged from time to time. Messrs. Bishop and Son, of London, have undertaken to erect an organ, upon which Mr. Pyne will frequently play, and several eminent English and Continental organists will be invited to perform. Doubtless some of our more ambitious semi-professional choral societies will appear occasionally, so that all classes of music may be represented. Altogether, a busy time for our eager young musicians, and an enjoyable summer for our citizens and for many thousands of Lancashire people may be looked for.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

FROM a plethora of musical events, unusually numerous and significant for the commencement of a season, it is difficult to judge whether the opening Concert of our best Society, the début of a young pianist who promises to soon link his name with the greatest executants, or the re-appearance—or, as some have termed it, the revival—of Italian opera in Liverpool, deserves the pre-eminence.

By force of habit, however, the Liverpool Philharmonic Society claims precedence, and this is not only justified chronologically, but the merits of the first Concert, which took place on the 5th ult., fully bear out the general expectation that the ensuing season promises to be amongst the most enterprising and successful of recent years. What Symphony, with all its melodic beauty and cleverness of structure, could be more acceptable than Mozart's "Jupiter"? and played by Mr. Hallé's orchestra with every finish, it served as a most admirable groundwork. Madame Norman-Néruda, as solo violinist, received a cordial welcome, and, although handicapped with Rodé's somewhat uninteresting Concerto in A minor, her rendering of Vieuxtemps's Fantaisie Caprice in A, with its double-stopping intricacies, was beyond all comment. Jensen's Cantata "The Feast of Adonis" was carefully given by the chorus, and with due regard to light and shade, and Mdlle. Trebelli in selections, which included Meyerbeer's delightful "Dinorah" Valse, strengthened the favourable opinion which she created at her first appearance in Liverpool last year. The work of the band also comprised Glinka's "Komarinskaja," and the Overtures to "Semiramide" and "Oberon."

The Second Philharmonic Concert took place on the 19th ult., and served to reproduce on the concert platform the vocal efforts which had become familiar at the Alexandra Theatre during the preceding week, the artists being Mdlle. Alma Fohstrom and Signor del Puente, of Mr. Mapleson's Company, who contributed various operatic selections. The chief interest of this Concert, however, attached to the admirable choice of orchestral pieces and to their uniformly excellent rendering. The Symphony was Mendelssohn's "Reformation," which is so thoroughly worthy, in its construction and elaboration, of being classed with his best writings, that it is singular we do not oftener hear it. An interesting Overture by Niels Gade, Macfarren's "Chevy Chase," and a spirited performance of Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise," No. 1, completed the orchestral selections, and the chorus gave intelligent assistance by their rendering of Schubert's "The Lord is my Shepherd" and Macfarren's "Orpheus with his lute."

Mr. Frederic Lamond's first Pianoforte Recital in Liverpool was given in the usual locale for such entertainments, the small Concert-room of St. George's Hall, on the afternoon of Saturday, the 16th ult., and it was somewhat unfortunate that the counter attraction of the opera at the same time interfered with the number of the audience. Certainly the performance was one which stands out prominently from its intrinsic and educational value. It is difficult to form a decided judgment of his powers from a single hearing, but undoubtedly execution and manipulative skill are his greatest possessions. This was palpable throughout his comprehensive programme, which contained Beethoven's C minor Sonata, Brahms's Paganini Variations, and examples of Chopin, Schumann, Rubinstein, and Liszt. There was also not wanting that individuality and absorption in the works themselves—not simply in the manner of their rendering to a listening audience—which are the sure indications of genius, and the development of which, with years, should place Mr. Lamond in a commanding position amongst living executants.

The return of Italian opera to Liverpool revives old recollections, and sets people wondering whether it can still compete with its English rival. After repeated changes in the announcements, the list of performances eventually resolved itself into the following:—"Il Barbiere di Siviglia," "La Traviata," "Lohengrin," "Sonnambula," "Lucia di Lammermoor," and "Faust." The opera, however, which showed the company at its best, was Rossini's "Barbiere," and it was refreshing to witness the hearty zest which was thrown into the entire performance. This occasion was also utilised for the début of an artist—Mlle. Jenny Broch—who had only just arrived in England, and who in some mysterious manner, was expected to at once take a foremost place amongst operatic stars. If she did not quite realise the exaggerated hopes of her sponsors, she yet made a more than favourable impression, and the extent of her compass, and the singular purity and ease of her chromatic runs formed the subject of wonderment, the applause which she received encouraging her to give other examples of florid vocalisation, such as the soprano air from David's "Perle de Brazil," and the Bolero from Verdi's "I Vespri Sicilienne." "La Traviata" was indebted to the finished singing and acting of Mlle. Lilian Nordica; "Lucia" to Mlle. Alma Fohstrom; "Lohengrin" to Mlle. Hastreiter; and of the gentlemen, Signors del Puente, Runcio—who appeared five times during the week—Foli, Padilla, and de Vascchetti deserve more than a mere reference. The Conductors sharing the work of this series of performances were Signors Arditi and Vianesi.

Italian Opera also paid us a visit on the 2nd ult., in the shape of a Ballad Concert at the Philharmonic Hall, by the chief members of Signor Lago's Company. Notwithstanding the fact, however, that the celebrated American soprano, Mlle. Ella Russell, was to make her first appearance in Liverpool, the attendance was ridiculously meagre, and scarcely encouraging to Italian Opera in this form. Mlle. Russell justified her reputation for the perfection of bravura singing, and Signor Gomez's clarinet solos were amongst the most enjoyable items in the programme. Signor Carlo Ducci directed the Concert with ability.

Mr. Sims Reeves' re-appearance at the Philharmonic Hall, on the 12th ult., attracted a crowded audience, and the excessive enthusiasm over his last song, the "Bay of Biscay," was carried to such a length as to interfere with the remaining items of the programme. Mr. Reeves was ably supported by Miss Henrietta Nunn, Madame Antoinette Sterling, and Signor Foli.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

MUSICAL Birmingham has sustained a heavy loss by the death of Mr. James Stimpson, the Town Hall Organist, which took place on the evening of the 4th ult. Mr. Stimpson had held his appointment, and taken a prominent part in the musical life of the town for over forty-four years, and his death leaves a gap which will not be soon or easily filled. Further details will be found in another column.

The musical section of the Midland Institute has not allowed the recent remarkable development of its teaching functions to interfere with its original work in the executive department of the art, and the first Concert this season, which took place on the 2nd ult., was, in some respects, the most important it has yet given. Under the modest title of a Violin Recital a regular Chamber Concert was given, in which the attractions of the instrumental portion were supplemented by the vocal performances of Madame Valleria. The violinist was Mr. Ludwig Straus, whose refined and artistic playing was much admired in Beethoven's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in A minor (Op. 23), in which he was joined at the pianoforte by Dr. Rowland Winn. In the Sarabande and Bourrée from J. S. Bach's Suite in B minor, for violin solo, a Nocturne by Ernst, and Molique's vivacious Saltarella, Mr. Straus gave yet more striking proofs of the excellence of his technique, which repeatedly evoked the applause of the audience. Besides taking part in the Sonata already mentioned, Dr. Winn played four short pieces—a Pastorale and Capriccio by Scarlatti, Rubinstein's Barcarole in G minor (Op. 50), and Mendelssohn's popular Presto in C (No. 34 of the "Lieder")—exhibiting in each case perfect taste and finished execution. Madame Valleria, who was in splendid voice, provoked quite a fuorore by her expressive singing of Mendelssohn's Swedish "Winterlied," and her impassioned and dramatic rendering of Schumann's "Widmung" fairly thrilled the audience. Equally charming in another style was her rendering of Spohr's "The bird and the maiden," the obbligato, arranged for violin, being played by Mr. Straus.

After a long succession of novelties, the Festival Choral Society this season is turning its attention to revivals, and several old works of merit, which the public were in danger of forgetting, are comprised in the current Concert scheme. One of these was Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Light of the World," performed at the Society's first Concert on the 7th ult., which had not previously been heard in Birmingham since 1873, at the Festival of which year it was originally produced. The large scale and undramatic character of the work are probably responsible to some extent for its neglect, for it contains some charming music that only just misses being great, and the orchestral writing throughout is exceedingly picturesque and elaborate. Of the performance one must speak in somewhat qualified terms, and though parts were admirable, there were frequent evidences of insufficient rehearsal, more especially in the playing of the band. In obedience to an invitation conveyed on a printed slip enclosed in the programme, the audience rose during the performance of the dirge-like prelude to the Bethany solo and chorus, "Weep ye not for the dead," as a tribute to the memory of the newly-deceased Town Hall Organist, Mr. Stimpson, who was to have officiated at this Concert. His place was filled at short notice by Mr. Gaul, the composer of "The Holy City." Miss Anna Williams, upon whom the principal soprano music devolved, sang with her accustomed earnestness, power of voice, and breadth of style, and was especially effective in Mary's jubilant song, "My soul doth magnify the Lord," and the grand scena in the Sepulchre scene, which, however, was given in an abridged form. Miss Hilda Wilson distinguished herself, especially in the air "The Lord is risen," with its tender consolatory sequel, "And God shall wipe away all tears." Mr. McKay's tenor voice is not a large one, but its quality is good, and he uses it with skill and judgment, as was shown more especially by his singing of the beautiful song "Refrain thy voice from weeping." Mr. Santley, as on the occasion of the first production of the work here, sustained the part of the Narrator, with which is identified the sacred personality of the Redeemer. In dramatic spirit and expressive power his performance was as fine as ever, and he sang his last solo, "Daughters of Jerusalem," with a fervour and splendour of voice that fairly enraptured the audience. In the concerted numbers, Mrs. Payton and Mr. Grice rendered efficient aid. The choruses generally were admirably rendered, the lengthy and elaborate chorus "I will pour My Spirit" being especially effective. Mr. Gaul rendered excellent service at the organ, and Mr. Stockley conducted with judgment and decision.

On the 11th ult., Mr. R. Rickard gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Acocks Green Institute. The programme comprised specimens of Bach, Handel, Beethoven, Chopin, Gottschalk, Raff, and Liszt, all of which were rendered with unexceptionable taste and technical skill. Mr. Rickard met with a very warm welcome from a large audience. The vocalist was Miss Preston, who possesses a pleasing soprano voice and sings expressively, and the accompaniments were carefully rendered by Miss Jessie Hiley.

On the same evening the Birmingham Sunday School Scholars' Festival opened in the Town Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. A. R. Gaul, with a performance in which that composer's Cantata "Ruth" had a prominent place. The choir numbered about 500 voices, and the principal vocal parts were rendered by Miss Clara Surgey, Miss Delia Atkins, Miss Lilian Mills, and Mr. Tom Horrex.

Mr. Stockley's first Orchestral Concert, on the 21st ult., was invested with special interest by the presence and co-operation of Mr. Dvořák, whose Symphony in D constituted the principal item of the programme. The work in question has been more than once heard here, but it was never so effectively given as it was on this occasion, when the eminent Czech composer himself conducted it. The performance indeed was a genuine triumph for the band, who seemed to enter completely into the fitful, impassioned spirit of the music, and acquitted themselves throughout in a manner that elicited the hearty commendation of the Conductor-composer. On the conclusion of the Symphony, the audience broke into loud and enthusiastic applause, in acknowledgment of which Mr. Dvořák had twice to return to the orchestra. Of the other orchestral pieces, Weber's Overture to "Oberon" and Massenet's fanciful suite "Scènes Pittoresques" were the most effective. The March from Wagner's "Tannhäuser" was a rather tough morsel for the band, and would have been the better for an extra rehearsal. Miss Fanny Davies, who is a Birmingham lady, gave an admirable performance of Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, and on its conclusion was honoured with a double recall. She was equally successful at a later hour in three short pieces for pianoforte solo, Handel's Gigue in A, and Mendelssohn's Barcarole in A and Capriccio in E. In the vocal department, the honours were divided between Madame Georgina Burns and Mr. Leslie Crotty. The lady sang Verdi's "Erani involami" and the piquant polacca from "Mignon," "I am Titania," with her accustomed brilliancy, and Mr. Crotty was very successful in Verdi's "Gri tu," and Balfe's "When I beheld the anchor weighed," the two artists uniting their efforts with excellent effect in Mozart's "Cruel perché." Mr. Stockley's conducting left nothing to be desired.

Messrs. Harrison's first Concert, on the 25th ult., was a noteworthy departure from usage and precedent, inasmuch as it consisted essentially of orchestral music instead of the usual ballad and operatic miscellanies which the public have been taught to look for on these occasions. The renowned band of Dr. Hans Richter was in possession of the orchestra, and treated the audience to such a performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and the same composer's "Leonora" Overture, No. 3, as has not been heard in Birmingham for many a day. The orchestral selection comprised also two examples of Wagner—the "Lohengrin" Prelude and the "Walkürenritt," to which it is needless to say the band did full justice. Berlioz's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation," and Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture made up the remaining items of the orchestral selection. The vocalists were Miss Hope Glenn and Mr. E. Lloyd, the latter of whom was very successful in Lancelot's song from Dr. Heap's Cantata "The Maid of Astolat."

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

QUITE apart from the Leeds Musical Festival, which of course has been the all-absorbing event of the month, there have been many musical gatherings of interest in the West Riding, and of sufficient importance to call for individual notice. That the Festival has given fresh impetus to the musical life of the county is apparent in many ways. One immediate effect has been the awakening of the Leeds musicians themselves to the fact that they are without an orchestra capable of rendering assistance at Concerts with any pretensions to art, and the determination to form a permanent Orchestral Society which, "in addition to giving three or four Concerts of its own, will be able to render much-needed help to the charitable and other entertainments of the town."

The want of a permanent orchestra is not peculiar to Leeds, but has been notoriously common to all the Yorkshire towns. In Bradford an endeavour is being made to supply the deficiency, and already the experiment has borne good fruit in the organisation of a series of popular Concerts, the chief feature of which will be the performances of an orchestra composed almost exclusively of local talent, and conducted by an indefatigable Bradford musician, Mr. W. B. Sewell. The first of these Concerts was given on the 16th ult., in St. George's Hall, which was fairly well filled. The orchestra went through a somewhat trying test with decided credit, and their performances evoked much enthusiasm. The selections included the Overtures to "Der Freischütz" and "William Tell," which were given with dash and precision, such as would do credit to a band of professional artists. In quality of tone the performances were, not unnaturally, scarcely all that could have been desired, but there were few instances of that most elementary failing—faulty intonation. A Largo in F sharp, by Haydn, a Pizzicato by J. F. Barnett, Reinecke's Entr'acte from "Manfred," and the Scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music constituted the remainder of the orchestral numbers. The promoters of the Concert had the assistance of the Chevalier Bach, whose first appearance in Bradford was attended with flattering results. Naturally, he devoted himself entirely to Liszt's compositions, two of which, the Concerto in E flat, and a Hungarian Rhapsody, he played with spirit and complete command over technical difficulties. Miss Thudichum, an old favourite of Bradford audiences, was the vocalist, and with her customary ability sang the well-known Scena from "Der Freischütz," and a composition by Arditi.

The appearance of Mr. Sims Reeves at a Ballad Concert given in St. George's Hall, Bradford, on the 8th ult., drew together a large audience. The veteran tenor was in capital form, and sung three of the old songs so familiarly associated with his name with astonishing vigour and with his usual finish. Mr. Reeves, of course, persistently declined to gratify the generally-expressed desire for encores, and something like a scene followed the close of his third song. Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Philippine Siedle, and Signor Foli contributed songs, and Mr. Nicholson and Mr. Maunder gave instrumental performances.

Madame Patey's Concert party, which included herself, Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Sidney Tower, Mr. Frederick Bevan, Mr. Barrington Foote, Herr Poznanski, and Signor Tito Mattei, appeared at the Headingley Parochial Institute on the 13th ult. Madame Patey, whose voice appeared to have been in no sense impaired by her labours at the Musical Festival during the previous week, met with a warm reception, as did also Miss Davies. The programme included many interesting items, notably Purcell's "Nymphs and Shepherds," sung by Miss Davies, and the Andante from Mendelssohn's MS. Scena "When the golden sun," the rendering of which by Madame Patey fairly charmed the audience. Signor Mattei played two solos of his own composition, and his arrangement of a well known air from "Don Giovanni" elicited marked approval.

The third of the present series of Huddersfield Subscription Concerts took place in the Town Hall on the 19th ult. The programme was in the hands of Madame Albani, Miss Emily Shinner, Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, Mr. Walter Parratt, and Signor Bisaccia. The appearance of Madame Albani evoked the utmost enthusiasm. Her selections were judicious, the first, Verdi's "Ah, fors è lui," enabling her to show off unique powers of vocalisation, and the second, "Angels ever bright and fair," equally demonstrating her splendid vocal capacity. Miss Shinner gave a very fine rendering of Spohr's "Dramatic" Concerto, and of the violin part of a Phantasietück for violin and piano, by Reinecke. The remainder of the instrumentalists acquitted themselves with executive ability of the first order. An interesting feature of the evening was the performance of one of Spohr's duets by two local violinists, Miss Isabella Donkersley and Miss Harriet Thomas, who combined with technical ability very fine taste.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

THE past month has been a productive one as regards music in Bristol, and has witnessed several Concerts of great interest. We have been favoured with a visit from M. Vladimir de Pachmann, and from Mr. Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda, and we could wish that such talented artists could be induced to visit us more frequently, this class of Concert being somewhat too rare in our city. The season may be said to have begun with the first of the series of the six Monday Popular Concerts to be given during the autumn. This took place on the 11th ult., and, we are sorry to say, was offered to only a limited audience, the galleries being all but empty. The Concert opened with Sir Arthur Sullivan's Overture "In Memoriam," given for the first time in Bristol. This fine work was excellently interpreted and most cordially received. The greatest interest of the evening was centred upon the production of Raff's "Lenore" Symphony, No. 5, in E (Op. 177), and upon this the most careful study and ungrudging labour had been bestowed, with a result upon which both Conductor and band may well be congratulated. The difficulties of the work are very great, but they were perfectly surmounted, the band playing with extreme precision and intelligence. Happily, this Symphony is not one of those compositions in which difficulty of performance is the chief merit, and its numerous and changeable beauties could not fail to strike and captivate an audience even on a first hearing.

Another event of interest was the production, for the first time in our city, of Dr. Hubert Parry's "Suite Moderne," written for the recent Gloucester Festival. Both the composer, who conducted, and the composition, were received with marked favour, Dr. Parry being warmly recalled. The other orchestral pieces were Weber's Overture "Oberon," and Gounod's March from "La Reine de Saba." The vocalists were Miss Emilie Lloyd and Mr. W. Thomas, of Bristol Cathedral, who both acquitted themselves admirably. Mr. George Riseley, who met with a most hearty welcome, conducted as usual.

M. de Pachmann gave his Recital on the 14th ult., when the estimation in which the great Russian pianist is held was amply shown by the very large audience which assembled in the Victoria Rooms. It was known that this would be the last opportunity of the kind for some years, and no doubt this fact tended to increase the number of auditors. M. Pachmann selected a varied and interesting programme, and played the whole from memory. Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 101) occupied the foremost place, and received a most artistic rendering. The other items were as follows:—Impromptu (No. 4), Schubert; Rondo in E flat, Field; Fäschingshwan (Op. 26), Schumann; Etude de Concert, Liszt; "La Fileuse," Raff; "Gutschwundenes," Gluck; and Toccata, Henselt; Nocturne, Three Etudes, Barcarole, Scherzo (No. 3), Chopin.

On the 20th ult. Madame Norman-Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé gave a Violin and Pianoforte Recital at the Victoria Rooms. The programme was as follows: Grand Pianoforte Sonata in D minor (Op. 29, No. 2), Beethoven; Violin Concerto in F sharp minor, Vieuxtemps; three Violin and Pianoforte Duets, Heller and Ernst; Spinnere Solo (a), Impromptu in F sharp, Chopin; (b) Spinnerelied (Wagner), Liszt; Violin Solos (a) "Berceuse Slave," F. Néruda; (b) Hungarian Caprice, Raff; Grand Fantasia, violin and piano in C, Schubert.

Organ Recitals were given by Mr. George Riseley, in Colston Hall, on the 9th and 16th ult.

The second Concerts of the Bristol Musical Association and of the Monday Popular Concerts Society took place respectively on the 23rd and 25th ult.

The Saturday Musical Association gave their second Concert this season, on the 23rd ult., at the Colston Hall, and the second given by the Monday Popular Concerts Society took place on the 25th ult., at the same place, both of which will be more fully noticed next month.

The Bath Philharmonic Society is now in full work, rehearsing for the Concerts to be given during this, its third, season. It is intended to present Gounod's "Redemption" and Sir Arthur Sullivan's new work, "The Golden Legend," with other compositions which will shortly be announced.

Madame Norman-Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé gave a Violin and Pianoforte Recital at the Assembly Rooms, Bath, on the 21st ult., to a numerous and interested audience.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND WEST OF SCOTLAND.

THE complete prospectus of the thirteenth series of Choral and Orchestral Concerts was issued at the public meeting on the 20th ult. It has been arranged to give twelve "popular" Concerts in all, in addition to the Subscription nights, two of them to be on Thursday evenings, in place of Saturday. The word "popular" may mislead. Let it be explained that it signifies lower rates of admission, not a lower character of music, for in respect to the class of music there is no practical difference between the sets of programmes. As I mentioned last month, the whole of the nine Symphonies of Beethoven are to be performed. They are to be produced in chronological order, the Choral Symphony concluding the series on February 8, 1887. The selections of orchestral music seem to have been made with the Committee's usual judgment, a happy mixture of the grave and the gay, the lively and severe, being noticeable. Among the works which will be performed for the first time are the following:—Gade's Concerto for violin and orchestra, the chief part in which will be taken by Mr. John F. Dunn, a young executant, who made a highly promising impression at these Concerts two or three years ago; Overtures, Auber's "La Sirène," Berlioz's "Corsair," Cherubini's "Lodoiska," and Cowen's "Festival"; and among the miscellaneous, Orchestral Scene, "The Forest of Arden," by Henry Gadsby; "On the Mountain" and "Village Life" from "Scènes Poétiques," B. Godard; Rakoczy March, Liszt; Selection from A. C. Mackenzie's opera "The Troubadour"—viz., Prelude to Act I., and "Jeu de Paume" Masque music, and Entr'acte to Act III.; Spanish Ballet from "Le Cid," and selection from Suite "Scènes Pittoresques," Massenet; Selection from Suite "Aus Aller Herren Lander," Moskowski; Capriccio Italien, for grand orchestra, Tschakowski; and the Interlude between Acts III. and IV. of "Tannhäuser" (Tannhäuser's Pilgrimage), Wagner. Goetz in F, Mendelssohn's A minor, Schubert's (unfinished) in B minor, and Schumann's No. 4, are the Symphonies announced in addition to the Beethoven set. There are two Concertos of Beethoven, Violin in D and Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat; Max Bruch's Concerto for violin, No. 1; Liszt's No. 1, in E flat, pianoforte; Mendelssohn's in E minor, violin; Schumann's Pianoforte, probably the A minor, his one Pianoforte Concerto proper. Overtures and miscellaneous pieces already performed here need not be detailed. It may suffice to say that the composers comprise the names of Sterndale Bennett, Berlioz, Rossini, Schubert, Wagner, Weber, Haydn, and Mozart. But it is to be understood that the foregoing are inclusive only of the announcements for the Subscription series of Concerts. In addition to the names of the vocal and instrumental soloists mentioned in my last letter, I may note those of Miss Carlotta Elliott, Miss Thudichum, Madame Clara Samuelli, Madame Marian Mackenzie, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. J. Bridson, and Mr. W. H. Burgon, vocalists; and Mr. J. F. Dunn, violinist, as already referred to. The orchestra will number eighty-five performers. I gave the names of the several important choral works last month. The Concerts begin, as before stated, on December 6.

The Kyrie Choir have taken up Macfarren's "Lady of the Lake," in addition to practising part-songs, &c., it being intended to perform the Cantata at some of the working-class Concerts to be given by the Choir further on in the season. Farmer's Mass in B flat is to be the first study of the Kilmalcolm Parish Church Society, which is now under the care of Mr. J. C. Fyfe, organist in the old historic church. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" is to be practised by the Lenzie Musical Society, and produced at their first Concert. Mr. J. Turnbull is the Conductor. J. F. Barnett's "Paradise and the Peri" is the choice of Pollokshields Musical Association this season, for their first Concert. Mr. W. T. Hoock being Conductor, as before. W. Hume's "Blind Bartimeus" has been selected by the Musical Society connected with University Avenue Free Church, under Mr. J. Mitchell, and the same work, written, it may be mentioned, with a view to at least comparative choral simplicity and moderate length, is to be taken up by the choirs of Pollokshields and St. Matthew's Free Churches respectively, under Mr. D. S. Salmond and Mr. W. H. Murray.

The Crosshill Musical Association has enterprisingly selected F. Corder's new Cantata "The Bridal of Triermain," one of the marked successes of the Wolverhampton Festival. Mr. A. Patterson is the Conductor of the Society, as before, and in his hands this interesting composition will doubtless receive by-and-bye a creditable rendering, as far, that is, as resources will permit.

Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea" is the choice this year of the Glasgow Southern Boys' Choir, Mr. H. McNabb, Conductor; and Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," always acceptable in the West, as doubtless elsewhere, will be studied by the Musical Association, under Mr. A. M. Mills, connected with Pollokshields United Presbyterian Church.

The Glasgow Select Choir gave its first Concert for the season in St. Andrew's Hall on the 2nd ult., Mr. J. Millar Craig conducting, and Mr. J. McGhee accompanying. There was little difference in the programme from what we have been accustomed to, part-songs and glees forming the chief element in its composition. The Pilgrim scene from "Tannhäuser" (Act III., scene 1) was a novelty. The male singing was fairly good in the Pilgrims' Chant, and the solos by Elizabeth and Wolfram were creditably given. Dr. A. L. Peace's accompaniment on the organ gave the orchestral effects as well as could be expected, certainly better, in the absence of an orchestra, than on the pianoforte alone.

On the occasion of the opening of a new organ in Kelvin-side Free Church, on the 4th ult., Dr. A. L. Peace played a number of solos, and the Glasgow Select Choir, out of regard to the memory of Mr. James Allan, their last leader, and for many years Conductor of the music in the congregation, appeared and sang a selection of anthems, &c. Mr. Frederic Lamond gave a Pianoforte Recital in St. Andrew's Hall, on the 21st ult. There was a crowded attendance, and the young virtuoso showed a marked advance in the direction of refinement.

The Bothwell Musical Association, conducted by Mr. McNabb, has chosen Schubert's Mass in C for one of two larger works to be practised this season.

The Uddington Society, which is this year in the charge of Mr. James Pattinson, vice Mr. George Taggart resigned, will take up Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm, "Lord how long wilt Thou forget me?"

The Dennistoun Musical Association, which for a number of years was conducted by Mr. T. S. Drummond, now of Hamilton, and had been inactive for a year, has now been started again, and the charge of it given to Mr. Whall. Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" is to be practised.

MUSIC IN WALES.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

A MUSICAL Eisteddfod was held on the 18th ult., at the Town Hall, Abergavenny, and embraced a variety of competitions. The audience was large, but consisted chiefly of the members of choirs and other competitors; Adjudicator, Mr. John Thomas, Llanwrtyd; hon. sec. and Conductor, Mr. H. Tonkin; accompanist, Mr. George Stevens; treasurer, Mr. W. E. Bromley. The principal results were as follows: "Sailors' Chorus" (Joseph Parry), by sixteen voices, for a prize of 30s. Three competing parties. Ebbw Vale Glee Party (Mr. W. Richards, Conductor) successful. "March of the Men of Harlech" (chorus), by choirs of between twenty and thirty voices, for a prize of £2. Two choirs sang—Glansychan (Mr. Prothero) and Young Amateurs, Abergavenny (Mr. Theophilus). The stipulation was that Barnby's version should be rendered, but one choir sang according to Mr. John Thomas's arrangement. The prize was, however, divided. For a prize of five guineas to the choir rendering in the most accomplished manner "O Father, whose Almighty power" three Societies competed. The Pontnewynydd Choir (Mr. Prothero) was successful. Chief choral competition, "Worthy is the Lamb." Four choirs competed. First prize of £20 went to the Pontypool and Abersychan Choral Union (Mr. Prothero), who were deemed to have sung it in an almost perfect manner, and the second to the Ebbw Vale Madrigal Society (Mr. T. Doughton).

A preliminary programme for the third grand annual musical Eisteddfod at Abergavenny, on Easter Monday, has been prepared. For the best performance by choirs of between 150 and 300 voices of the chorus "Wretched Lovers" ("Acis and Galatea"), a first prize of £100, and gold medal for the Conductor; a second of £50, and silver medal for the Conductor; and a third of £25 are offered. For the best performance by a choir of not less than sixty, and not over ninety voices, of the chorus "March of the Men of Harlech," prize £20, and gold medal for the Conductor. Male voices, 30-45, "Soldiers' Chorus" ("Faust"), £10, and a silver medal. Four-part song "If thou art sleeping, Maiden," prize £4. Other prizes are also offered.

The Bedling (Dowlais) Eisteddfod, on the 4th ult., was presided over by Mr. W. Beddoe, the Conductor being Mr. T. Clement Thomas; Caradog (Mr. Jones, Cardiff), adjudicated in the chief choral contest for a prize of £12 for the best rendering of "Datod mae Rhwyfan caethwed." Six choirs entered the lists, namely, Bedling Choral Society (Mr. J. Bassett, Conductor), Llanfobon Choir (Mr. E. Thomas), Merthyr Vale (Mr. J. Lewis), Treheris Choir (Mr. T. John), Ynysowen (Mr. E. Pugh), Deri (Morgrugyn). The South Walian Ynysowen vocalists were successful. The Bedling Choir took the prize of £3 for the best singing of "Y Goff by male voices. Solo, "He was despised," by Miss Catherine Morgan, Dowlais; tenor solo, "Thou shalt break them," Mr. J. Richards, Merthyr. A Merthyr man, Mr. W. Phillips, also took the prize for his rendering of the bass solo, "The trumpet shall sound." Of two competitors in the soprano solo, "When the midnight moon is shining," Miss Pollie Jones, Merthyr Vale, was successful. Best rendering by children's voices of "Di difater genyt in colli ni?" Four choirs competed: Vochriw, 1; Lochar, 2.

The Baptist Choral Association of the Upper Rhondda met on the 11th ult., at Treorky, a mining village. The vocalists were about 800 in number. Presidents during the day, Dr. Idris Davies and Mr. Jacob Ray; Conductors, Messrs. W. T. Samuel, Swansea; T. Jones, and E. Cule.

On the 12th ult., the Cardiff Blue Ribbon Choir, which has attained such proficiency under the leadership of Mr. Jacob Davies, commenced a fortnight's tour at Cheltenham. The Assembly room was crowded. The leading vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Lucy Clarke, and Miss M. Purvis; Mr. F. Griffiths, R.A.M., and Mrs. Clara Novello Davies, instrumentalists. They have visited Liverpool and Leeds. On the 6th ult., the Junior Blue Ribbon Glee Party, conducted by Mr. F. C. Noote, gave a rendering at the Roath Public Hall of "Harry Grey" (a Temperance Cantata).

In connection with the re-opening of Langatock Church, Crickhowell, which has been restored at a cost of £2,000, there was a luncheon, on the 8th ult., at the National Schools, presided over by Sir Joseph Baily, Bart., M.P., after which an Organ Recital was given by Mr. C. M. Bill, A.C.O., Swansea. The instrument cost £240. Collections during the day, £180.

series of Concerts devoted to this class of music was held at the Lesser Park Hall on the 13th ult., under the auspices of Professor Templeton, University College of South Wales. The leading artists were Herr Peiniger (violin), Herr Brouil (cello), and Eos Morlais (tenor). Schubert's Trio in E flat and Mozart's in B were given, and the violinist played Beethoven's Romance in F.

At Merthyr, Concerts have been held in connection with St. David's Church and the Protestant Sunday School.

Mr. T. E. Aylward, Organist of Chichester Cathedral, has been appointed Organist of St. Andrew's Church, Cardiff, and of the Park Hall, in succession to Mr. Lemare. He was formerly Organist of Llandaff Cathedral, and was very popular as a musician in the neighbourhood of Cardiff.

The performance of the "Creation" at the Temperance Hall, Tredegar, on the 18th ult., was one of the most noteworthy local musical events which have been recorded for a long time. The Choral Union has not been formed longer than about six months. It now consists of 200 members, with Mr. I. J. David as Conductor, Messrs. E. C. Davies and D. H. Thomas, honorary secretaries, and Mr. Mr. G. G. Golding (Organist, St. George's Church), accompanist. The choir was assisted by Miss Julia Jones (London), Mr. J. F. Millar (Wells), and Mr. Montague Worlock (Bristol). Mr. E. T. Roberts, Cardiff, conducted the orchestra, which consisted of Cardiff and Tredegar contingents. At the close of a very successful rendering of Haydn's masterpiece, Mr. J. Colquhoun, J.P., the manager of the Tredegar Steel Works, said he believed he was correct in saying that it was the first time an oratorio had been performed in Tredegar. He had attended the performances of oratorios in many English towns, but he had never heard better singing anywhere than he had that night. He also recognised the great interest taken in the movement by the Conductor.

From the balance-sheet just issued of the last Concert given by Madame Patti, at Swansea, in aid of local charities, it appears that a net balance remains in hand of £60s. Half of this sum will be given to the Swansea Hospital, and the remainder to the poor of Craig-y-nos, in which neighbourhood the residence of the prima donna is situated.

On the 20th ult. a farewell Concert was given at Tonnwynlais, near Cardiff, to Madame Hattie Davies-Edwards, who is about to leave this country for Australia. Mr. George Fisher presided, and there was a large audience present. The favourite vocalist herself rendered several well-received selections, and she was assisted by Dr. and Mrs. Frost (Cardiff), Miss Thomas (Porth), Mr. J. Richards (Penarth), and Mr. Gwilym Thomas (Porth). Miss Fisher was the accompanist.

On the 23rd ult. an Eisteddfod was held at the Town Hall, Neath, for the benefit of the Neath United Choir. Adjudicator, Mr. T. M. Price, Merthyr. Five choirs competed for a prize of four guineas and a metronome for the Conductor, offered for the best rendering of "Yr Alarch." Briton Ferry was successful. For the best rendering of "Dyddian Hyfryd," Alltwn Choir received two guineas. Tenor solo, David Lewis, Aberavon.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

The chief cities of the United States are busily engaged just now in preparing for a musical season which promises to be as interesting as any of its predecessors. In Boston the programme that has been outlined, and more especially the interest shown in the promised Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, indicate a greater public activity than has been seen of late in New England's capital. The advance sale of tickets for the series of weekly Concerts given through the wealth and liberality of Mr. Higginson, and under the direction of Mr. Gericke, has been astonishingly large, so large indeed that it seems doubtful whether there will be a single unpurchased chair in the large Music Hall, when the first Concert takes place. The band, which last year was brought to a high degree of proficiency, will be materially strengthened, it is thought, by accessions from Germany, in the department of wind instruments, wherein alone it fell short of the highest standard, and it is therefore safe to say that Boston will this year have as good orchestral music as New York, which is tantamount to saying as good as any city in the world. Such a consummation has long been wished for, and if it is finally brought about it will be entirely due in the first instance to the intelligent philanthropy of Mr. Higginson. Finding that his confidence in the Boston public was not misplaced, that gentleman is gradually extending the province of his excellent and successful endeavours, and during the coming season will give many other cities the benefit of the organisation designed originally for Boston alone. The venerable Handel and Haydn Society (which lost one of its oldest and most faithful friends and officers in the shocking carriage accident which killed Mr. C. C. Perkins in Vermont last summer) will make Bach's Mass in B minor the chief business of its winter's work, but will also give the "Creation," which, at the present stage of the Society's career, is not likely to cause it much trouble. The smaller societies and clubs of the city have been energetic and enterprising in planning their schemes for the season, and on the whole the dwellers in Boston will have little cause to envy New York, outside of the operatic representations, which will have no ceasing from November till April.

The aggregate number of first-class entertainments in New York will, perhaps, not be so great as it was last season, but the probabilities are that they will be more interesting. The last week has seen the publication of the prospectuses of nearly all the larger organisations in the city. Concerning each of them a few words. First in seniority and importance stands the Philharmonic Society, which seems to have come out of an internecine warfare that appeared to threaten to impair its usefulness, with renewed energy and ambition. The directors are spared the trouble of appealing very strenuously for support from the public by the circumstance that nearly all the stalls at their disposal are subscribed for year after year in advance. Still these gratifying relations with the public have been slightly modified this year by the fact that the Society has determined to give its six Concerts with their preliminary public rehearsals in the Metropolitan Opera House, instead of the Academy of Music, as for many years heretofore. This step, which may make the series of Concerts more successful financially than they have been (though there has been no time within the last five years when fault could be found on this score), is not likely to be hailed with satisfaction by the entire body of subscribers. The new audience-room contains many more stalls than the old, and is superior in point of cleanliness and appearance, but it is too vast for orchestral Concerts of the kind given by the Philharmonic Society. In going to the Metropolitan Opera House, however, the Society has only followed in the footsteps of all the other musical organisations of magnitude. The Academy of Music has been deserted even by the American Opera Company, notwithstanding that the latter had already closed a contract of lease which it will be obliged to fulfil, so far as the payment of rent is concerned. Among the novelties promised in the prospectus of the Philharmonic Society are Anton Bruckner's Symphony in E major (announced, but not performed, by Mr. Hans Richter in the last London season), a Symphony, "after Byron's Manfred" (Op. 58), by Tchaikowsky; Brahms's Fourth Symphony, the Symphony in C by Saint-Saëns, possibly a new Symphony by Rubinstein, and a Symphony by Alberto Franchetti. Second in importance to these Concerts come the sixteen projected by Mr. Theodore Thomas (who will also conduct the Philharmonic Concerts), and divided evenly between Tuesday evenings and Thursday afternoons. One half of these Concerts will be crowded into the month of March, a necessity of this kind being created by the multiplicity of Mr. Thomas's engagements. Mr. Thomas's intentions concerning his programmes are not set forth in his prospectus, but they can be read fairly well in the four schemes which are appended thereto. They promise a comparatively larger and more interesting list of new works than was offered in the Popular Concerts last season. The early novelties will be a new "Heroic" March, by Massenet, Henry Gadsby's "Forest of Arden," a "Tarantelle," by César Cui, Massenet's "La Vierge," a "Slavic March," by Tchaikowsky, and the "Pante-mimes" of Ludwig Schytti, orchestrated by Müller-Berghaus. Sir Arthur Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture will be heard for the first time under the direction of Mr. Thomas, on the 4th inst. Mr. Van der Stucken's novelty Concerts have been relieved of the atmosphere of doubt and severe effort which used to surround them by Messrs. Chickering and Sons, the pianoforte manufacturers. Desiring that their beautiful hall should be the home of some of the city's high-class Concerts, they have undertaken the management of Mr. Van der Stucken's Concerts, and increased their number to nine. Of these three will be adapted to the comprehension of the younger generation, and will be given in the afternoon. For one of these latter Concerts Mr. Van der Stucken has made a happy choice in the "Children's" Oratorio of his teacher, Benoit. His principal achievement, however, will be the first performance of the music of Berlioz's "Les Troyens à Carthage." It is a matter of history that this somewhat fantastical work of Berlioz suffered a mournful fate in Paris, which was not without its influence upon the health and spirits of the composer. Unquestionably the dramatic structure of the work is more to be blamed for this failure than the music, much of which is exceedingly fresh and vigorous; at any rate, this is Mr. Van der Stucken's view of the matter, and he has therefore had the work remodelled so as to make a sort of dramatic Cantata out of it, connecting the scenes with lines to be declaimed at the performance by an elocutionist.

There is less in prospect in respect of choral music. There will be plenty of singing of small works and songs by the half-dozen private or semi-private clubs of the city, but the Concerts of the Oratorio Society will be limited to three, and at the second of these "The Messiah" will be given, in compliance with the old custom, which under some circumstances would be more honoured in the breach than in the observance. The only other large work announced thus far is "Israel in Egypt"; so to hear something unacknowledged New Yorkers will have to go to Brooklyn where Liszt's "St. Elizabeth" and Rubinstein's "Paradise Lost," have been included in the programmes of the Philharmonic Society. The promise is greater in opera. On the 18th inst. Signor Angelo's enterprise (or perhaps it would be nearer the truth to say, Madame Valda's) will be launched at the Academy of Music. It is not likely to set the North River on fire, yet it deserves to be welcomed with more kindness than has been shown Italian ventures of recent years, if for no other reasons than that something akin to modesty has characterised the announcements, and that the repertory will not be so threadbare as Mr. Mapleson's has been for years.

The German Company, with Lehmann, Niemann, Brandt, Robinson, and Fischer as its strongest props, will open a season of sixty nights on the 8th inst. The additions to the old repertory will consist of Goldmark's "Merlin," Brüll's "Goldene Kreuz," Wagner's "Siegfried" (and possibly "Tristan"), and Verdi's "Aida," besides a couple of the successful Viennese ballets. The advance sale of seats has been much larger than was that of last year, and a successful season is confidently expected. On February 28, 1887, the Company will yield the Metropolitan Opera House to the American Opera Company, whose managers have pledged themselves, in consideration of the use of the up town theatre, not to appear in New York until after the close of the German season. This abolition of rivalry will probably redound to the benefit of both establishments. The only interesting new work promised by the American Company is Rubinstein's "Nero."

Thus much for things in futuro. Concerning things of recent accomplishment little is to be said. The Worcester (Mass.) Festival (twenty-ninth of the annual series) took place on the third week of September, and was an unexpectedly great success from a financial point of view. Unfortunately the artistic results were not so gratifying, though Mr. Zerrahn and his forces deserve much praise for excellent work done in Bruch's "Arminius" and Gounod's "Redemption," which compositions marked the high water of artistic achievement. Rheinberger's "Toggenburg" and Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" showed insufficiency of preparatory study. As for the miscellaneous features of the programme, they scarcely call for comment at this time or in this place.

MUSIC IN DRESDEN.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

It is not without interest to trace the current of musical feeling in the Saxon capital, being, as it is, the most characteristic centre of all the Teutonic Fatherland. The operas given here during the last month or two have not been so strongly stamped with the Wagner seal as outsiders might expect. Only five of the works of the great master himself, and two of his imitators, have been recently given; a large house was drawn by "Die Folkunger," an ingenious setting of an unusually spirited text by Mosenthal. The interest of the plot centres in Magnus, heir to the Swedish throne, who has been forced by a "wicked uncle" into taking an oath that he will deny his identity and remain perdu in a cloister. The circumstances which combine to bring him to light and to confound the conspirators are brought about with tact, and the "business" is never without interest throughout four acts. The name of the composer has a special interest for English musicians from the fact that he was formerly the deputy, and is now the successor of the late Herr Merkel as organist to the Catholic Cathedral. The Dresdeners speak of Herr Kretschmer as belonging to the Wagner school, but beyond the fact that the score is not divided by numbers, but runs on from scene to scene continuously, and that an occasional combination of wood and brass recalls "Lohengrin," the two styles are diametrically opposed. "Die Folkunger" contains a Coronation March, which might well figure in London Concert programmes.

The other work of a disciple of the hero of Bayreuth, which has been recently given, though with less éclat, is the "Queen of Sheba" (Goldmark), which has little to recommend it but the acting of Fräulein Malten, and compares unfavourably with Herr Kretschmer's work, whether seen from an artistic point of view or from that of the public. The whole Wagner Trilogy has been given within the last few weeks; "Siegfried" was the least attractive of the three dramas, and "Götterdämmerung" the best attended; but even on this occasion the English language, either in its indigenous or transatlantic form, outweighed the German in almost every part of the house. The physical power of Herr Gudehus, in the tenor part, probably exceeded any analogous effort that had been witnessed on an operatic stage. The most crowded house since the commencement of the winter season was drawn by "Lohengrin." The title rôle and that of Elsa fell respectively to the lot of Herr Gudehus and Fräulein Malten, as of yore; a new baritone, Herr Schrauff, showed dignified bearing and good presence, combined with correct intonation, in the part of Telramund. The converse qualities were conspicuous in Herr Reise as Jean of Leyden, in the "Prophète" of Meyerbeer, of which a mutilated but finely rendered version was recently produced. On hearing this popular singer attack B flat and C natural from the chest, without the suspicion of a break in quality of tone, and sustain those notes indefinitely, one wished that his stature—a head and shoulders below that of the Bertha of the evening—could have been assimilated to the compass of his fine organ. Intending visitors may be interested in hearing that the band which plays on Sunday evenings at the well known Belvedere, under the intelligent direction of Herr Trenkler, shows a marked improvement on former years. The music at the Catholic Church (the home of the "Dresden Amen") shows no change; the most recent Masses performed at the eleven o'clock Sunday service having been Beethoven in C, Mozart in E flat, which is best known from its Agnus Dei, and a very fine Mass by Reissiger in D minor.

OBITUARY.

It is with sincere regret that we record the death of Mr. James Stimpson, the talented and highly respected Organist of the Town Hall, Birmingham, which took place on Monday evening, the 4th ult., at his residence in Islington Row. The deceased was the son of Mr. William Stimpson, Lay-Vicar of Lincoln Cathedral, and afterwards of Durham. At seven years of age he was a chorister in Durham Cathedral, and when fourteen years old he was articled to Mr. Ingham, Organist of Carlisle Cathedral, under whom he made such progress that he frequently acted as his master's deputy. Whilst holding the appointment of Organist of St. Andrew's Church, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and afterwards of Organist of Carlisle Cathedral, he devoted much time to the study of the orchestra, and became a skilful performer on the violin and double bass. In 1842 the post of Organist of the Birmingham Town Hall became vacant, and, after an eager competition, Mr. Stimpson was elected, his long tenure of this important office, and the excellent manner in which he performed its duties, amply justifying the umpires in their choice. His performance on the occasions of the Musical Festivals, and at the many Concerts given in the Town Hall, won for him repeated tributes of praise, amongst which must be mentioned that of Mendelssohn, who thoroughly appreciated the value of his services when "Elijah," under the composer's own conductorship, was produced at the Festival of 1846. Mr. Stimpson established—and was Organist and choromaster of—the Festival Choral Society, and in 1845 was instrumental in starting the Monday Evening Concerts, which he carried on upon his own responsibility until 1867, when, having sacrificed the whole of his life's savings, he felt compelled to give up the attempt to make these entertainments self-supporting. On the formation of the Birmingham and Midland Musical Guild his professional brethren unanimously elected him as the first president, and he was re-elected in the second year. He was an excellent performer on the organ, his technique being generally admired, and an earnest advocate of the highest classical music. His published works were chiefly arrangements; but he was also the author of a Manual on the Theory of Music. Birmingham has indeed lost in Mr. Stimpson a true friend to the art which he so ably represented, and his death will be long and widely felt.

THE annual distribution of diplomas, certificates, and other awards to the successful candidates at the higher examinations of Trinity College took place on Tuesday, the 5th ult., at the College, Mandeville Place, Manchester Square, when the Warden, the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, F.R.S., Edinburgh, delivered the inaugural address of the session on "Musical Study, Past and Present." The Warden said the present was the tenth consecutive occasion upon which he had had the honour to address the pupils of Trinity College on various aspects of musical study, and dwelt upon the increasing advantages offered to musical students of the present day. He wished it to be more generally known that, from the first, Trinity College had supplied the want of affording facilities for general culture in conjunction with musical study, and within this term new arrangements had been made by which students in the musical faculty could profitably pursue their general education as well as their musical studies, and thus qualify themselves for the matriculation examination which was required from every candidate for the higher diplomas. The Warden then presented the certificates and awards, after which ceremony the proceedings terminated.

ON one of the mornings of the Leeds Festival a select company met at the establishment of Mr. Archibald Ramsden to hear a short Pianoforte Recital by a son of the late Rev. Dr. Dykes, who, for the last three years, has been studying under Madame Schumann. Mr. Dykes played a choice selection of classical pieces, including Mendelssohn's "Variations Sérieuses," to the entire satisfaction of his critical hearers, who saw in him a "coming man." We understand that the young artist will not make his début in England for some time yet, and has gone back to resume his lessons. When he does choose to appear we shall be surprised if he does not at once attract much attention as a classical performer of high rank.

A PERFORMANCE of Mendelssohn's "Athalie" was given at the Kensington Vestry Hall on Monday evening, the 18th ult., under the direction of Mrs. A. J. Layton, the principal solos being taken by members of the ladies' choral class. Mrs. Ellis Cameron was the reader, and the accompaniments were played on the pianoforte and harmonium by Messrs. C. G. Lamb and T. Ely. The second part was miscellaneous, and included choruses by Mendelssohn, Marchetti, &c., and solos by Miss Annie Layton, Mr. Frederick Williams, and Mr. A. J. Layton.

THE Harvest Festival was held, on the 3rd ult., at St. Dionis' Church, Parsons Green, which was very tastefully decorated with fruit, corn, and flowers. The morning service Te Deum and Jubilate was Smart in F; the Anthem, Dr. Stainer's "Ye shall dwell in the land" (the solos efficiently rendered by Mr. Boutell and Master Alfred J. Kenningham); the Kyrie and Creed, Dr. Garrett's setting in D; and the Offertory Sentence, Calkin's "Whoso hath this world's good," the solo being excellently sung by Mr. Alfred Kenningham, the remaining principal parts by Master Kenningham, Dr. Webb, and Mr. Boutell. In the afternoon a Children's Flower Service was held, which was remarkably well attended. The evening service was a great success, the Anthems being Goss's "I will magnify Thee" and Handel's Hallelujah Chorus. The Church was crowded in every part, numbers being unable to gain admission. The choir (which is entirely amateur) reflects the greatest credit on the Organist and Choirmaster (Mr. Alfred Kenningham), who must have worked very hard to attain so gratifying a result. The service was fully choral throughout. Mr. A. W. Wells, who assisted at the organ, deserves the warmest praise for his efforts.

THE Harvest Festival at Holy Trinity Church, Kentish Town, N.W., was held on Saturday and Sunday, the 2nd and 3rd ult. The Festival commenced with full Choral Evensong on Saturday, when the Canticles were sung to Ebdon in C, the Anthem being "I will give thanks" (Barnby). On Sunday the Holy Communion was celebrated at 8 a.m., when the service was fully choral, Dr. Stainer's Gregorian Service being used. At Matins the service was Dr. Stainer's in E flat, and the Anthem "The earth is the Lord's" (A. Lowe). At Evensong the music was the same as that used on the preceding evening, with the addition of Haydn's "Heavens are telling," as the Anthem after the service, which concluded with a recessional hymn. The rendering of all the music by the choir was exceptionally good throughout, and the services were attended by large congregations. Mr. A. Cunliffe Smith presided at the organ at all the services, and gave a Recital after Evensong.

ONE of the two Choral Festivals held annually at the Church of St. Augustine and St. Faith, Watling Street, took place on Wednesday evening, the 6th ult. (St. Faith's day), when the church was filled by a devout and attentive congregation. The music included "He that shall endure" ("Elijah"), sung before the commencement of the service, Martin's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in B flat, and "Be thou faithful," and "Happy and blest" ("St. Paul") as the Anthem; followed by Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" in its entirety, the overture being played as an organ solo. The adult portion of the choir was slightly augmented for the occasion, but the treble part was sustained for the first time at these services by the choir boys of the church unassisted. The result reflected much credit on Mr. C. E. Miller, the Organist and Choirmaster of the church, who presided at the organ throughout the service.

THE members of the South London Musical Club gave their forty-seventh Smoking Concert, on the 5th ult., at the Gresham Hall, Brixton. The programme consisted of glees, part-songs, choruses for male voices, songs by members, and violoncello solos by Mr. W. C. Hann. Of the vocal part music, the most noticeable items were "The Miller's Daughter" (Hartel), "Ossian's Hymn to the Sun" (Goss), "The Beleaguered" (Sullivan), "Nymphs of the Forest" (Horsley), and "A Legend of the Rhine" (Smart). Messrs. Holdsworth, E. G. Richardson, Branscombe, and Garratt, contributed songs, and the playing of Mr. Hann was much appreciated. Mr. Charles Stevens conducted, and Mr. G. B. Lissant accompanied, as usual.

THE Harvest Festival Service at All Saints' Clapton, was held on Wednesday, the 13th ult., and Sunday, the 17th. An orchestra, with the organ, accompanied the services. The music performed included—Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C, by W. M. Wait; Anthems, "The heavens are telling" (Haydn) and Gloria from Mozart's Twelfth Mass; and Voluntaries, "Cornelius" March and War March of Priests (Mendelssohn), and Occasional Overture (Handel). Mr. W. J. Winter presided at the organ on the 13th, and Mr. J. H. Wait on the 17th, the Conductor on both days being Mr. W. M. Wait.

THE members of the St. George's Glee Union gave their 212th consecutive monthly Concert in the Pimlico Rooms, Warwick Street, on the 1st ult. There was a large and appreciative audience, and the Concert was thoroughly successful. The solo artists were Madame Lita Jarratt, Miss Edith Stow, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. Alec Marsh. In the first part the Overture to "Zampa" (Hérold) was performed by Mr. F. R. Kinkeed and Mr. F. Kinkeed on the pianoforte and harmonium, and in the second part Mr. Charles Gardner played the pianoforte soli, Minuetto Espresso and Toccata in C minor (Bennett). The chorus singing included glees by Stevens, John Wilbye, Bishop, Webbe, and Handel. Two glees, "Tell me, babbling echo" (Paxton) and "When the shadows of evening fall" (Spencer), were sung as double quartets. Mr. F. R. Kinkeed presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

THE prospectus of the sixteenth season of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society is again full of interest. Ten Concerts are announced as follows:—On the 3rd inst., Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; on the 15th, Hiller's "Song of Victory" and Sullivan's "Golden Legend"; on December 15, Gounod's "Redemption"; on January 10, 1887, Dvorák's "St. Ludmila"; on February 9, Haydn's "Creation"; on March 10, Rossini's "Messe Solennelle"; on April 30, Berlioz's "Faust"; and on New Year's Day, Ash Wednesday, and Good Friday, Handel's "Messiah," all the Concerts commencing at eight o'clock in the evening, except those on March 10 and April 30, which will begin at three o'clock in the afternoon, and "The Messiah," on Good Friday, which will commence at seven o'clock. The season will be brought to a close with a grand Festival performance to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the Queen's accession.

THE Harvest Festival at Hanover Church, Regent Street, W., was celebrated on September 30 and the 3rd ult. The music given on the first occasion included Gadsby's fine setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (in C), and the well-known Anthem of Tours "While the earth remaineth," the solo in which was well sung by Master A. Browne. The choral portion of the service on the 3rd comprised Te Deum (Allen) in D, Jubilate (Hopkins) in F, Anthem "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Stainer), the solo being sung by Mr. F. M. Harding, and for the Communion Service the setting used was Haynes in G throughout. The evening celebration on the 3rd was identical with that of the opening service. On each occasion the services were attended by a vast congregation. The singing was highly praiseworthy, and reflected great credit upon the Organist and Director of the choir, Mr. J. G. Ranalow.

WE have much pleasure in drawing attention to an excellent portrait of Professor Sir G. A. Macfarren recently issued by Messrs. W. H. Beynon and Co., of Cheltenham. Drawn from photographs taken for the express purpose by Messrs. Lombardi and Co., of Pall Mall East, the work has been entrusted to Michael Hanhart, Esq., who has had a sitting from the life, and certainly secured an admirable likeness of this well known artist. The circulation of copies of the portrait will be limited to subscribers only; and as the drawing will be erased when applicants have been supplied, the names of those who wish to possess this valuable souvenir should be sent in as speedily as possible.

THE first Subscription Smoking Concert of the season was held at the Cannon Street Hotel, on Tuesday, the 26th ult. The first part of the programme consisted entirely of compositions by the late J. L. Hatton, and included "The Clown's Song," "To Anthea," and "Shepherd's Winter Song"; and part-songs "When evening's twilight," "Tar's Song," "Evening," &c. The second part was miscellaneous. The songs were rendered by Messrs. A. Thompson, A. James, Schartau, W. G. Forington, and Master Humm.

WE announce with much regret the death of Mr. David Kennedy, the well-known Scottish vocalist, which took place on the 13th ult., at Stratford, Ontario, where he had arrived on a tour through Canada and the United States. His entertainments were widely and deservedly popular, and his loss will be much deplored by the many lovers of genuine Scottish music.

A CONCERT was given at the Drill Hall, Bermondsey, on the 11th ult., on behalf of Christ Church, by the hon. Choirmaster, Mr. Frank Pridmore, who conducted a special choir and orchestra of 120 performers. The choir sang several part-songs, glees, &c., in a very efficient manner, Mendelssohn's "Farewell to the Forest" receiving a warm encore. The vocalists were Miss Annie Ryall, Miss Louisa Robins, Mr. James Budd, and Mr. C. Gooding. Mr. Louis B. Mallett showed much skill in his two violin solos—"Scène de Ballet" (De Beriot) and "Air Varié" (Vieuxtemps); and Miss Watts's pianoforte solo, "Rhapsodie Hongroise" (Liszt), was played with much brilliancy. Mr. E. Frisby conducted the band selections, and Mrs. Watts accompanied.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society held their 176th monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road, on Friday, the 15th ult. The opening of the first part consisted of a miscellaneous selection, followed by "The Sun Worshippers" (Goring Thomas), the choruses in which were given with much vigour and precision. The second part consisted of the "Jubilee" Cantata (Weber), which was equally well rendered and received with satisfaction by a large audience. The soloists were Madame Adeline Paget, Mrs. Luff, Miss Kelly, Mr. Donnell Balfe, Mr. T. P. Frame, and Mr. W. C. Burridge. Mrs. T. P. Frame presided at the pianoforte, Mr. A. Wood at the Mustel organ, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

THE first of Dr. Rea's Newcastle-on-Tyne Subscription Concerts for the season 1886-7 is announced to take place on the evening of the 1st inst., under the conductorship of Mr. Richter, and with his orchestra of eighty-five performers—vocalist, Mrs. Hutchinson. At the second Concert (December 9) Gounod's "Redemption" will be given—principal vocalists, Mesdames Thudichum and Bolingbroke, Mr. Iver McKay and Mr. Brereton; and at the third (February 15, 1887) a new work will be performed, probably one of the prominent novelties at the Leeds Festival, the vocalists engaged for the occasion being Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Bridson. There will be a chorus and orchestra of 350 performers.

THE Harvest Festival at St. Mary's Parish Church, Balham, was held on Sunday, the 3rd ult. The service at Matins was sung to Dykes in F and Woodward in E flat. At Evensong the canticles were sung to Prout in F, the Anthem being "O that men would praise the Lord" (Dr. Joseph C. Bridge, of Chester), and the offertory Anthem, "Hallelujah," from the "Mount of Olives" (Beethoven). Mr. H. W. Weston, A.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster of the church, presided at the organ, and after Evensong gave a short Recital, including, among other pieces, Smart's Solemn March in E flat, Allegretto in B minor (Guilmant), Allegro vivace (Handel), and Air and Variations from the Symphony in D (Haydn).

THE first two Concerts of Mr. Henschel's series of London Symphony Concerts will take place on the 17th and 25th inst. The first will include Brahms's Symphony in D, No. 2; Beethoven's Concerto for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello in C (Op. 56); "Good Friday's spell," from Wagner's "Parsifal"; Prelude to the third act of Mackenzie's opera "The Troubadour," &c. At the second Concert, Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, No. 4; Schumann's Concerto in A minor (Miss Fanny Davies); Saint-Saëns's Ballet music, "Henry VIII.," and an Idyl, "Evening on the Sea Shore," by Mr. F. Corder, will form the principal features.

SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN's Oratorio "The Prodigal Son" was given on Monday, the 25th ult., at the Stepney Meeting House, by the choir of St. John's, Waterloo Road, S.E., the solos being taken by Master Warren, Miss Tunnecliff, Mr. H. Cooper, and Mr. Frederick Winton. Mr. Henry J. B. Dart presided at the organ. The second part was miscellaneous.

MISS NELLIE CHAPLIN's second Monday Popular Ballad Concert of the present series took place at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on the 18th ult. The artists were Miss Ethel Winn, Miss Lena Law, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Franklin Clive (vocalists), and Herr Theodor Liebe (violin-cello); Conductor, Mr. Fountain Meen.

For the Oxford Examination, October, 1886, the following have satisfied the Examiners for the Degree of Bachelor in Music: F. Koeller, New College, and Tiverton, Devon; H. T. Lewis, Christ Church, and Rotherham; W. G. Price, Queen's College, and Belfast; F. J. Simpson, New College, and Hillingdon, Middlesex; D. F. Wilson, New College, and Ayr. For the Degree of Doctor in Music: T. W. Dodds, Organist of Queen's College, Oxford. In a congregation held on Thursday, the 21st ult., the following were admitted to the Degree of Bachelor in Music: Messrs. H. T. Lewis, W. G. Price, and D. F. Wilson.

MADAME WORRELL gave her annual Concert at the Brixton Hall, on Monday evening, the 4th ult., before a large audience. Madame Worrell, who was highly successful in all her songs, was assisted by Madame F. Winn, Miss Bertha Moore, Miss E. Winn, Miss F. Hipwell, Mr. Franklin Clive, Mr. H. Yates, and Mr. Henry Guy, vocalists; Madame Emily Tate, solo pianist; and Miss Anna Lang, solo violinist. Miss Mary Chatterton contributed a harp solo, and Mr. Turle Lee and Mr. Walter Hedgcock conducted. A well selected miscellaneous programme was excellently rendered.

On the 23rd ult., at the Bow and Bromley Institute, instead of the usual Organ Recital, an excellent selection of Instrumental Music was given by the following artists:—Mr. Bernhard Carodus (violin), Mr. Waud (viola), Mr. J. Carodus, Jr. (violoncello), and Mr. Fountain Meen (piano-forte). Movements from the Quartets by Weber and Mozart (in G minor) were much applauded, and the sons of our distinguished violinist were very successful in their solos, Mr. Bernhard Carodus being enthusiastically encored. The vocalists were Miss Bishop and Mr. Frank May. Mr. Fountain Meen was the accompanist.

THE Harvest Festival was held at St. Philip's, Camberwell, on the evening of the 7th ult. The music comprised Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C (A. J. Eyre), anthem, "I will magnify Thee, O God" (Goss), and Gloria (Mozart's 12th Mass). The choir was largely augmented, numbering over sixty voices. Mr. Sidney Hill presided at the organ, and Mr. Charles O. M. Philips, Organist and Choirmaster of the church, conducted. At the conclusion of the service an Organ Recital was given by Mr. Sidney Hill, which was much appreciated.

THE customary Harvest Festival services at St. James's Church, Knatchbull Road, Camberwell, were given on Thursday evening, the 21st ult., and following Sunday. The musical portion of the services was rendered in a manner worthy of high commendation, and comprised Smart's Morning and Evening Service in F, Wesley's Anthem "The Wilderness," Gadsby's "Blessed be the name," Goss's "Fear not, O Land," and the Hallelujah from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives." Mr. R. Felix Blackbee, F.S.Sc.L., presided at the organ with ability.

THE Harvest Festival at the Parish Church, West Hackney, on the 18th ult., was highly successful, a choir of about 100 voices, and an orchestra of twenty performers taking part in the music, which included A. R. Gaul's Cantata "The Holy City." The solos were sung by Mr. Thomas Kempton, Mr. Frost, Mr. Henry Thom, Masters Humm and Lewis. Mr. H. Baynton led the band, Mr. R. T. Gibbons, F.C.O., presided at the organ, and Mr. Francis L. Kett, the Choirmaster, conducted. The Cantata and the whole of the service were excellently rendered.

THE Thirteenth Season of the Crouch End Choral Society opened with a Conversazione at Christ Church Schoolroom, on Tuesday, the 5th ult. The President, the Rev. C. W. Edmonstone, occupied the chair. After a very interesting paper on Choral Societies had been read by the Conductor, Mr. Alfred J. Dye, a number of part-songs and solos were performed by members of the choir. Handel's Oratorio "Samson" will be given at the first Concert on December 21.

MR. JOHN GRITTON gave his first Concert on the 19th ult., at Stormont Road Lecture Hall, Lavender Hill, the vocalists being Miss Minnie Bush, Mrs. Carter, Messrs. Kessell, Watts, Issard Dean, and John Gritton; Mr. Walter Hann, R.A.M., was solo violinist, and Mdlle. Blanche St Clair, T.C.L., pianist. Mr. Frank Idle (Medalist, R.A.M.) ably fulfilled the duties of Conductor.

A SPECIAL service was held in St. John's Church, Vartey Road, Stamford Hill, on Wednesday, the 20th ult., for the dedication and opening of the organ, built by Messrs. H. Jones and Son. The special Psalms were sung to double chants by Mr. W. J. Letts (the Organist) and Sir John Goss. The Nunc dimittis was sung to Lord Mornington's Chant in E flat. The solo vocalist was Mr. W. H. Brereton. Dr. G. C. Martin, deputy Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, presided at the organ, and displayed the capabilities of the instrument to the greatest advantage.

HARVEST Festival Services were held at St. John the Evangelist, Kilburn, on Friday, the 1st, and Sunday, the 3rd ult. On the 1st, Canon Duckworth preached the sermon, and the music included Bunnett's Cantate Domino and Deus Misereatur in F, and Gadsby's Anthem "Blessed be the name of the Lord," both Anthem and service being repeated at the evening service on the 3rd. The musical arrangements were under the direction of the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. Herbert Rolfe, A.C.O., who presided at the organ on each occasion.

THE Harvest Festival at St. John's Church, Bethnal Green, was held on the 12th ult. The service was Tours in F, and the Anthem Dr. Bunnett's "I will magnify Thee," scored for orchestra by the composer. "The Heavens are telling" ("Creation") was sung after the sermon. There was a large choir and an efficient orchestra, conducted by Mr. Edwin Ward, the Organist of the church. Mr. H. J. Baker, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Michael's, Bowes Park, presided at the organ.

MISS MEREDYTH ELLIOTT gave her Annual Evening Concert on the 13th ult., at Steinway Hall, assisted by several well-known artists, including Miss Annie Leckington, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Miss Marie Davies. The Concert-giver was much applauded in her conscientious and sympathetic rendering of songs by Paul Rodney, M. Krohn, Hope Temple, and Tosti, the lady being gifted with a genuine mezzo-soprano voice of agreeable timbre, and fairly well trained.

THE Liverpool Courier announces the death of Mr. W. Ridley, F.C.O., which occurred on the 5th ult. Mr. Ridley came to Liverpool thirty-five years ago, when sacred music was at a very low ebb in that city, and by his exertions did much to raise the standard of church services in the neighbourhood. He was Organist and Choirmaster of West Derby Parish Church for twenty-five years, and afterwards succeeded his son, Mr. S. Claude Ridley, as Organist of St. John the Baptist's Church, Tue Brook.

THE Harvest Festival Services at St. Philip's, Sydenham, were held on Sunday, the 3rd ult., under the direction of Mr. Battison Haynes, and were throughout of a most successful character. The music performed at the high celebration consisted of Eyre's Creed in E flat, and Sanctus, Benedictus, Agnus Dei, and Gloria, B. Haynes in E flat; and at Evensong, Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Goss in A, and Anthem, "I will magnify Thee," Calkin.

THE Harvest Festival services were held at St. John's, Waterloo Road, on September 30 and the 3rd ult. The Canticles were sung to Stainer's setting in B flat, and the Anthems were Hopkins's "I will give thanks," and a selection from the "Hymn of Praise" (Mendelssohn). The Tuesday evening Organ Recitals were given on the 5th, 12th, and 26th ult., by Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, and on the 19th ult. by Mr. Charlton T. Speer.

THE Harvest Festival at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, was celebrated on Wednesday evening, the 6th ult. The Canticles were sung to Tours in F, and the Anthem was "All Thy works praise Thee," by E. H. Thorne; and at the close, Garrett's Te Deum in D was sung. Mr. J. R. Griffiths, Organist and Director of the Choir, presided at the organ. The service was repeated on Sunday, the 10th ult.

WE are requested to state that Miss Florence May will give a series of three Piano-forte Recitals in Berlin in January, 1887, when she will play selections from the works of Couperin, Rameau, Scarlatti, Alberti, Symonds, Greene, Handel, Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Weber, Schumann, Chopin, Brahms, Liszt, Moscheles, Bennett, Bargiel, Moszkowski, and Florence May.

THE Harvest Festival at St. George's, Camberwell, took place on the 7th ult., the church being filled in every part. The service was sung to Garrett in F, and the Anthem was Sydenham's "Great is the Lord," which was excellently rendered. After the service, the Organist, Mr. G. Augustus Holmes, gave an Organ Recital, his selections from Smart, Guilman, Silas, Salome, Sullivan, and others being performed in most effective style.

THE Harvest Festival at St. Luke's Church, Brompton Hospital for Consumption, was held, according to custom, on St. Luke's Day, the 18th ult. The service, which was fully choral, and included Bunnett's Evening Service in A, and the Anthem, "All Thy works" (T. Mee Pattison), was excellently rendered by the members of the church choir, under the direction of Mr. F. Gilbert-Webb.

AN Organ Recital was given at Christ Church, North Finchley, on the 12th ult., by Mr. F. A. W. Docker, Organist of St. Andrew's, Wells Street. The vocalists were Miss May Cartwright, Messrs. C. and J. C. Thompson, and Master W. Lawrence. The last named (a member of the choir) has been appointed to the choir of St. Andrew's, Wells Street.

At an examination of Pianoforte Tuners held by the Regent Hall Association on September 29, at 44, Devonshire Street, Portland Place, the following were awarded the Regent Hall certificate of qualification to practise:—E. J. Akhurst, of 4a, Above Bar, Southampton; C. H. Dry, of Spring Bank, Hull; Richard Durrant, of Lindfield; and R. A. Mann, of High Street, Colchester.

AN Organ Recital was given in the Church of St. Katharine Cree, Leadenhall Street, on Tuesday, the 19th ult., by Mr. C. H. Rowcliffe, Jun. The programme included the Overture to the "Chaplet" (Dr. Boyce), Offertoire in D (Batisse), and Concerto in B flat, No. 2 (Handel). There was a large attendance.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of "Jephtha" in Stepney Parish Church, on the 20th ult. The soloists were Miss Clara Hosccke, Mrs. Dean, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. James Blackney. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ.

A PERFORMANCE of Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" was given in St. Anne's Church, Wandsworth, on the 7th ult., with a choir of about 100 voices, under the direction of Mr. Frederick W. Doe, Organist and Choir-master. Mr. G. P. T. Chave presided at the organ.

THE Lancaster Choral Society announces four Concerts for the approaching season. Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" is to be given on the 10th inst., two performances of "The Messiah" at Christmas, and the "Elijah" on April 17, 1887.

MR. A. W. SEBASTIAN HOARE, A.Mus., has been elected a life member of Trinity College, London, in recognition of his services for many years past as Local Secretary of the London Centre for the Practical and Theoretical Examinations of the College.

THE winter season of the St. Bartholomew's Hospital Musical Society was announced to begin on the 28th ult., under the direction of Mr. Avalon Collard and Dr. W. S. A. Griffith, Conductor of the chorus. The first Concert will take place in December.

A SERIES of Organ Recitals will be given at the Church of St. Barnabas, Kentish Town, on the new organ, built by Alfred Monk, Holloway Road, every Saturday evening at 7.30, until Christmas.

SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN has resumed work upon his new opera for the Savoy, and will now continue till the task is completed. It is expected that he will agree to write a short piece for the Gloucester Festival of 1889.

MR. F. H. COWEN will probably be invited to assist the veteran, Mr. Done, in conducting the Worcester Festival of 1887. Mr. Cowen's new Oratorio will be brought out on that occasion.

MR. C. L. WILLIAMS, Organist of Gloucester Cathedral, will compose a short Biblical Cantata for the Festival of 1889, the words to be supplied by Mr. Joseph Bennett.

MR. BLUME, the eminent singing-master, has been appointed Professor of Singing at the Royal College of Music.

MISS MARY DAVIES, the popular soprano, will shortly be married to the Principal of the Training College for Ministers, Bangor.

SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN leaves England at once for Switzerland.

REVIEWS.

Manual of Harmony. By Lindsay Sloper.
[Joseph Williams.]

THE multiplicity of books on the theory of music published within the last few years is a proof that the subject is at least receiving much attention, but it is unsatisfactory to find that in our educational establishments a diversity of opinion still exists as to the basis of the system which should be taught. Those who watch the progress of musical events must now begin to perceive that masters are much inclined, instead of binding themselves to a specific text-book, to take what they consider to be truths from all the text-books, and teach orally, making reference only occasionally to recognised authorities in confirmation of the views they entertain. The book before us may be accepted as an evident sign of the growth of this idea, for Mr. Sloper in his preface says: "The aim of this Manual is to be practical. Controversial it certainly is not; for I am too well aware of the difficulty that has all along existed in finding a scientific basis for modern harmony, not to respect the endeavours of my predecessors to ascertain if such there be. I claim to have made myself acquainted with almost all previous treatises on the subject, and I have endeavoured to teach by the aid of some of them. A thoughtful professor, however, learns as much from the students under his care as they learn from him; and feeling much interest in my work, I have tried to discover the causes of their trouble. It was not until I used, for the purpose of instruction, the work of Ernst Friedrich Richter, of Leipzig, that I found the intelligence of my pupils thoroughly awakened; and I wish now to express my acknowledgment of the fact that, for the outline of this little book, I am indebted to him. But there was a point at which I was constrained to part company from Herr Richter, because I felt the want, for my use, of this Manual. The truth of M. Fétis's views on the chords of the ninth, eleventh, and thirteenth, on altered chords, and on suspensions, had so long impressed me that I longed to place them before my pupils; and I had some ideas of my own with regard to modulation that I also desired to state." This candid admission of the motives which prompted the author in writing his Manual, of course disarms criticism upon the work as a thoroughly developed system, especially as in many places he debates how a chord should be really written. For instance, in speaking of what we consider the diminished seventh upon the raised subdominant, at page 47, he tells us that preference must be given (in the key of C) to writing E flat instead of D sharp, "because the D sharp and C natural are so suggestive of the key of E minor." The seventh on the leading note is termed a "secondary seventh," the bass having an "exceptional" resolution, a semitone upwards. All these statements show that the author does not admit the necessity of determining what is the root of a chord before we can know how to write or resolve it. As we have before said, however, we must not review the book as an exposition of Mr. Sloper's theory, but as a reflection of the theories of others, with a few additions of his own. Viewed in this light, there is much to be said in favour of the work. Many of the explanations are extremely clear, and the examples are generally happily illustrative of the text.

Intermodal Harmonies for the Gregorian Psalm Tones. By J. W. Doran, M.A., and E. D. Galloway, M.A.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

GREGORIAN musical literature continues to grow apace, though the probabilities of the ancient church modes finally ousting the modern Anglican chant are less than ever. We know how endeavours are made in some quarters to gild the pill of the Gregorian Tones by tricking them out with ornate chromatic harmonies, and in recognition of this incongruity, as well as of the injurious effect on the voice of perpetually singing them in unison, the editors of the present book have supplied harmonies to each tone taken from the notes of other tones. By this means diatonic progression is secured, and also some kind of melodic interest in the lower parts. If the harmonies are plain and severe, they are at any rate in keeping with the ancient melodies, which the florid variations improvised by organists anxious to display their own skill are certainly not. A harmonised version of the versicles and responses according to the Sarum use is also furnished.

The Organ Works of J. S. Bach. Edited by J. F. Bridge, Mus. Doc., and James Higgs, Mus. Bac., Vol. 2, Book 6. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS admirable edition of Bach's immortal organ works is advancing apace, and the present section contains some of the composer's grandest efforts, such as the magnificent Prelude and Fugue in E flat (known as St. Anne's), the brilliant Fugue in D major, and the very original Toccata and Fugue in D minor. The hints for registering and the suggested metronomic speed will be found very useful by students, and the Preface contains much valuable information as, for example, the explanation of the term "pro organo pleno," which many players take to mean simply, a "full organ."

Short Settings of the Office of the Holy Communion. No. 9, by King Hall, in C; No. 10, by J. F. Bridge, in D. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. KING HALL is a new worker, so far as we are aware, in the field of church music, though he has gained a reputation by his graceful contributions to another form of art. His Communion Service shows that with experience he may master the spirit as well as the letter of this particular department of musical labour, for there is much in his setting of the Eucharistic Office that is commendable, despite some crudities. The writing is for the most part simple and unassuming, but there are some noteworthy exceptions. One of these is the peculiar and decidedly effective series of harmonies commencing at the words "And was incarnate" in the Nicene Creed. The staccato chords in the Gloria in Excelsis are somewhat out of character, and the final Amen, a chord of the ninth on the sub-dominant, with an odd position of the parts, has a harsh, grating effect. We mention these points because Mr. King Hall's talent will enable him to do better in the future than he has done in the present service, musically as it is in most respects. Dr. Bridge's service is even less pretentious, as it only occupies fourteen pages instead of twenty-three. A large proportion is in unison, and where harmony in the voice parts is given it is of the most ordinary kind. At the same time an artistic spirit is evinced in the correct accent of the words, and the purity of style united to extreme simplicity ought to render the service popular with parish choirs.

The Childhood of Christ. By Hector Berlioz. [Forsyth Brothers.]

THIS is a revised edition of a work which has scarcely, as yet, taken the position in public favour to which its beauty entitles it. It is quite possible that the exceedingly bad English translation hitherto used has had something to do with the matter, and a new version by "M. H." appears in the present edition. Though the words are not in every instance closely fitted to the music, the rendering is generally nearer to the original text and, in a literary sense, shows marked improvement.

Three Songs without words. No. 1, Réverie; No. 2, Adieu; No. 3, Revoir. For the Pianoforte. Composed by M. Bourne. [Ascherberg and Co.]

THERE is an unpleasant succession of octaves between melody and accompaniment in the first of these pieces which to us somewhat mars the effect of what would otherwise be a melodious and pleasing sketch. No. 2 has a pathetic subject, with a flowing quaver accompaniment, which strengthens the eloquence of the theme; and No. 3 (the best of the numbers) is an attractive little song, alternating between A major and minor, and effectively employing both hands throughout. There are indications in these unambitious sketches that the composer can do something better than multiply specimens of a style of which even advanced musicians are beginning to get wearied.

Our God is Lord. By Emma Mundella. The Lord preserve thee. By Philip Armes. The Lord is my Shepherd. By C. Villiers Stanford. Octavo anthems, Nos. 303-5. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

HARVEST Festivals are over for the time being, and Miss Mundella's anthem, which is intended for these occasions, will therefore have to wait until next season for recognition, but choirmasters will do well to bear it in mind, as it is within the means of the humblest body of church singers who claim to be able to sing in parts. It is brief, homophonous, and strictly diatonic throughout. We cannot credit the composer with any inventiveness, but her music is grammatically correct, and if it does not strike the ear with a sense of freshness, it is at any rate free from all manner of offence. The anthem of Dr. Armes is a more important composition, and is suitable to all occasions, but is specially intended for saints' days. The composer loses no time in displaying his high class musicianship, the opening chorus, after a few introductory bars, consisting of a fully developed fugue. The brief final chorus also contains a fugato, but between these movements there is a flowing and more melodious quartet, in excellent contrast. The anthem is written in the purest style of English church music, and cannot fail to please in circles where modern notions have not yet gained ascendancy. Dr. Stanford's setting of the 23rd Psalm is, as might be expected, a composition of a somewhat different calibre. It opens with a charming chorus in 6-8 time, in which the pastoral style and devotional feeling are happily mingled. At the words "Yea, though I walk," the manner is modified though the measure is maintained, and we have some striking harmonic progressions eventually leading to a resumption of the original movement, which comes to the quietest possible close. The last chorus, though scarcely so pleasing, is appropriate enough to the words, and the close is extremely expressive. The anthem is well worthy of its composer, and nothing further need be said in its favour.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F. By C. L. Williams. Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in G. By E. H. Thorne. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE first of these services was composed for the recent Gloucester Musical Festival, and was favourably mentioned in our notice of the meeting. Without showing any distinctly novel traits—which would scarcely be possible in a simple "full" service—the writing is extremely dignified and church-like, and we may specially note the charming melody and harmony in the accompaniment of the verse "He remembering His mercy." Mr. Thorne's service is very different in character. Its most remarkable feature is the freedom and independence of the voice parts. It abounds in points of imitation, and the composer is almost as fond of sequences as Gounod. Many of these sequential passages are highly effective, although in some instances they result in false accents. Of course it is not so, but the service gives one the impression that the words have been fitted to the music and not the music to the words. This defect allowed for, much remains for praise; indeed, it is some time since we have met with so clever and attractive a setting of the evening canticles.

Caprice (L'Amitié) in G major. For the Pianoforte. By Walter Macfarren. [Edwin Ashdown.]

APART from the melodiousness of all Mr. Walter Macfarren's compositions, they are excellent studies for touch and phrasing, qualities which must ever recommend them to the many artistic students rapidly growing around us. There is much refinement in the subject which commences this piece, and the second theme—first introduced in the relative, and afterwards in the tonic, minor—is effective, both by contrast, and on its own intrinsic merit. The whole of the episodic matter betrays no sign of patchiness, and it need scarcely be said that the passages lie well under the hand.

FOREIGN NOTES.

An important "In Memoriam" performance of works by the late Franz Liszt was held on the 11th ult. by the Berlin Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Herr Klindworth. The following numbers constituted the programme, viz.: Dramatic Scene "Jeanne d'Arc" (vocalist, Fraülein Marianne Brandt); Piano-forte Concerto in E flat major (executant, Mr. d'Albert); Symphonic Poem "Héroïde Funèbre"; and "Dante" Symphony. The performance was preceded by an impressively worded Prologue, spoken by Herr Ludwig Barnay, and forms an event in Berlin musical life all the more noteworthy since the musical productions of the pianist-composer met with but little appreciation in the German capital during his lifetime.

A Liszt commemoration was announced to be held on the 22nd ult., at Buda-Pesth, by the Philharmonic Society of that town. The "Héroïde Funèbre," "Tasso," and the first movement from the "Dante" Symphony formed part of the performance.

Liszt commemorations have also been held at Dresden (by the Tonkünstler Verein), on the 4th ult., and at Mannheim (by the Musikalische Akademie), on the 21st ult.

A committee has been formed at Oedenburg, his native town, for the purpose of erecting a monument to the late Franz Liszt.

According to the latest information received, the remains of Franz Liszt will not be suffered to be disturbed in their present resting place at Bayreuth. The Municipal Council of the town have, moreover, decided to raise a worthy monument over the great musician's grave.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph writes to that journal under date 18th ult.: "A reparation, which his countrymen admit to be tardy, was offered to the memory of Hector Berlioz, the celebrated composer, yesterday. His statue, by M. Alfred Lenoir, was unveiled in the Place Vintimille, before a large assembly of distinguished musicians and general admirers of the composer of "La Damnation de Faust." Among those present were M. Ambroise Thomas, M. Gounod, M. Massenet, M. Léo Délibes, M. Garnier, the Vicomte Delaborde (Chairman of the Berlioz Committee), several members of the Academy of Fine Arts, M. Garcin (of the Conservatoire), and numerous others. Addresses were delivered by M. Delaborde, M. Garnier, and M. Reyer, who detailed the various incidents of the career of Berlioz, his success in Austria and America, and the neglect which he suffered at the hands of Frenchmen. In the intervals of the addresses the band of the Republican Guard played the "Symphonie Funèbre et Triomphale," which Berlioz had composed in honour of those who fell during the Revolution of 1830, and the "Marche des Troyens." The Symphony was conducted by M. Colonne, whose choir—assisted by the children of the Municipal Schools—took up the vocal parts. The performance was warmly applauded. M. Sylvain, of the Comédie Française, recited some verses in honour of Berlioz, putting especial fire into the strophes relating to the introduction of Wagner's music into France, and the consequent necessity incumbent on Frenchmen to pay more honour than ever to Berlioz. The actor was also loudly applauded. A wreath of evergreens, sent by a Vienna Musical Society, was laid at the foot of the statue. In M. Lenoir's work the composer is represented leaning for support against a rather shaky-looking music stand, his head on his hand. His face wears a pensive and melancholy aspect. On the pedestal are inscribed the names of his works. None of the composer's direct descendants were present. His wife—the English actress, Miss Smithson, who played Ophelia and other Shakespearian characters at the Odeon when Kemble came to Paris—died broken-hearted at Montmartre, while her husband was going about the world with a singer of no talent." Apropos of the allusion here made to Wagner's music, we may point out the omission on the part of the above representatives of a nation priding itself upon its generosity, of any mention of the hearty and most appreciative welcome accorded to Berlioz in Germany, notably at Leipzig, during his artistic tour in 1843, and at a time when even his best works were all but ignored in his own country.

Under the title of "Les Deux Pigeons" a new ballet was brought out last month at the Paris Grand Opéra, with considerable success. The author of the libretto is M. Henri Regnier, and the composer M. André Messager, a pupil of M. Saint-Saëns, who some time since gained the City of Paris prize for his Cantata "Prométhée."

We understand that M. Eugène Gigout, the Organist of the Church of St. Augustine, of Paris, a musician highly esteemed in musical circles of that capital, intends shortly to visit this country for the purpose of giving a series of organ recitals.

M. Colonne's first orchestral Concert of the present season was held at the Paris Châtelet on the 24th ult., when the programme consisted entirely of works by Berlioz, including the Ballet music from "Les Troyens," the "Symphonie Fantastique," and "Oraison Funèbre," the latter being a portion of the work written by the master, at the request of the government of King Louis Philippe, in commemoration of the Revolution of 1830.

M. Padeloup's Concerts Populaires were announced to be resumed at the Paris Cirque d'Hiver, on the 31st ult. According to the eminent Conductor's present scheme, the Concerts are to take place on the last Sunday of each month during the season—i.e., from October to May, instead of every Sunday as in former years.

M. Gounod delivered a discourse at the annual public meeting of the Paris Académie, on the 25th ult., his subject being "Nature and Art," which latter the veteran French composer defined as "one of the three incarnations of the ideal in the real." M. Gounod's peroration is said to have partaken largely of the character of a sermon.

The widow of Georges Bizet, the celebrated composer of "Carmen," is about to be married to M. Emile Strauss, a distinguished member of the French bar.

An operetta "Adam et Eve," by M. Gaston Serpette, met with a favourable reception on its first performance last month at the Théâtre des Nouveautés in Paris.

A series of eleven Concerts is announced to be given at the Gürzenich Hall of Cologne, under direction of Dr. Wüllner, during the season just commenced. Among the more noteworthy works to be performed are the following: Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Bach's Passion Music (St. Matthew), Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette" Symphony, Brahms's Symphony, No. 1, Niels Gade's Symphony, No. 4, Rubinstein's new Symphony, Wüllner's 127th Psalm, and three Symphonies by Beethoven. Among minor choral and orchestral works appear as composers the names of Liszt, Wagner, Raff, Volkmann, Cherubini, Schubert, and Dvorák. The Gürzenich Concerts of Cologne, rendered famous under the bâton of the late Ferdinand Hiller, and now conducted, on a somewhat broader basis, by the able and energetic Dr. Wüllner, rank, as our readers are aware, among the first of similar institutions in Germany.

According to some chatty and interesting "Reminiscences of Mozart," contained in recent issues of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, the true author of the libretto of "Die Zauberflöte" was one Giesecke, a runaway student from the University of Halle, who earned a precarious livelihood as a chorus-singer at the operatic establishment conducted by Schikaneder at Vienna. The story of the book, it is added, is based upon Wieland's "Lulu," and Schikaneder's share in it amounts to some alterations here and there, and to the addition of those odd personalities, Papageno and Papagena, although he has always been credited with the authorship of the entire libretto. The latter as every one knows, is a curious mixture of Oriental fancy and naïve realism, displayed upon a background replete with lofty sentiments borrowed from Freemasonry; but is by no means altogether so absurd as some superior persons at the present day would have us believe. To conclude the above narrative, Giesecke, being a member of the then persecuted body of Freemasons, and thinking himself suspected as the author of the book of "Die Zauberflöte," fled from Vienna (about the year 1790), and eventually became a highly-respected professor of natural history at Dublin. It should not be so very difficult for any lover of the great master at the Irish capital to ascertain the correctness of the final statement contained in this interesting, but unauthenticated story, concerning the "poetic basis" of Mozart's most truly popular opera.

A correspondent sends us a very interesting account of the new opera "Ramiro," by Herr Eugen Linder, the first performance of which, at Leipzig, we recorded in our last "Notes." We must, however, limit ourselves here to the following brief extract from our correspondent's critical observations:—"A modern German Opera without Leit-motive is doubtless an impossibility. Those employed in the present instance are, however, not unpleasantly obtrusive, but skilfully utilised as suitable adjuncts to the various situations. The music is for the most part both melodious and harmonious, and contains some very agreeable and effective orchestration. As the first effort in this direction of a young composer it is not without faults, but possesses sufficient merit to justify the report of its having been placed permanently on the répertoire of the Leipzig Stadt-Theater. Requiring, moreover, only four leading singers, the work is likely to meet with a good reception also at many provincial theatres. A very determined and evidently organised opposition was shown on the first night, but was borne down by those who went to judge for themselves, and each successive performance gained in applause, so that neither composer nor interpreters had reason to be dissatisfied with their several receptions and recalls. The performance itself, however, was a very indifferent one, only Herr Schelper, who sang the title-part, rising above very decided mediocrity."

At the Imperial Opera of Vienna a new operatic work entitled "Maria," composed by the Baron Hasslinger-Hassingen, who has adopted the pseudonym of Hager, was performed last month, but has met with a very lukewarm reception.

The Berlin Symphonie-Capelle gave its 400th orchestral Concert on the 9th ult.

Dr. Paul Klengel, the zealous Conductor of the Leipzig Euterpe Concerts, has accepted the post of first Conductor at the Stuttgart Hof-Theater, where he will assume his functions in January next with a performance of Byron's "Manfred," to be given with Robert Schumann's music.

The Berlin Allgemeine Musik Zeitung says: "A new species of musical art, which appears eminently calculated to benefit the festive services of our Protestant churches, is about to be called into existence. We learn that the well-known composer and musical author, Herr Meinardus, of Hamburg, has been commissioned to write a 'Kirchliches Oratorium' for solo voices, chorus, congregational song, and organ, which is to be performed next Easteride, as an integral portion of the service, at a church in Königsberg. The new oratorio is to be entitled 'Emmaus,' and the results of this experiment of inviting the participation of the general congregation in the performance of an important oratorio, will be looked forward to with much interest by all lovers of sacred art."

The new Hof-Theater at Schwerin was inaugurated, on the 3rd ult., with a festive performance of Richard Wagner's version of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis."

Herr Wilhelm Tappert, of Berlin, announces in the Musikalisches Wochenblatt that the draft of a Symphony in E major, by Wagner, has been found in the Wahnfried archives at Bayreuth. It was composed in 1834, at a time when the poet-composer was musical director at Magdeburg.

Victorien Joncières's opera "Le Chevalier Jean," met with another decided German success at its first performance on the 7th ult., at the Frankfurt Stadt-Theater.

Señor Sarasate, the eminent violinist, at present engaged upon a concert tour, intends shortly to leave Europe for the United States, where he proposes to remain for several years.

The German Empress and her grandson, Prince Wilhelm, have joined the list of patrons of the Bayreuth Festspiele with an annual contribution of 1,000 marks each.

Dr. Hans von Bülow has resigned his position of Conductor of the Concerts of the Imperial Musical Society at St. Petersburg, which will be under the direction, this season, of Anton Rubinstein. One of the principal works to be performed will be Liszt's Oratorio "St. Elizabeth."

Friedrich Schneider's once famous Oratorio "Das Weltgericht" ("The Last Judgment"), was revived last month at Leipzig, at a Concert given on behalf of the Society of Music Teachers of that town.

Herr Max Bruch has just completed a new Symphony, which is to be first publicly performed at the third Philharmonic Concert of this season at Berlin, under the direction of Dr. Joachim.

The new comic opera "Auf lohen Befehl" ("By supreme Command"), composed by Herr Carl Reinecke, of Leipzig, was brought out for the first time on any stage at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater on the 1st ult., and met with a very sympathetic reception.

Madame Amalie Joachim, after having retired from the operatic stage for twenty-five years, reappeared last month at the Munich Hof-Theater in the character of Orpheus in Gluck's opera of that title.

A new Violin Sonata (No. 2), written by Herr Brahms, will be first performed at one of the Hellmesberger Chamber Concerts of Vienna this winter.

Herr Julius Röntgen, a son of a well-known Leipzig musician, and pupil of Moritz Hauptmann, has been appointed successor to M. Verhulst in the direction of the Amsterdam Philharmonic Society, known as the Maatschappij tot Bevoorderen der Toonkunst.

By order of the Italian Ministry, the great collection of musical works hitherto forming part of the Municipal Library of Rome, is to be transferred to the Academia di Santa Cecilia of that capital, which institution will thus be enriched by the most complete and valuable musical library said to be in existence.

A new operetta in three acts, bearing the familiar title of "Le Nozze di Figaro," by the maestro, Antonio Martini, was recently produced at Florence, and is said to have achieved a great success.

An opera, "Fausta," by the maestro Primo Bandini, has been brought out at the Teatro Dal Verme of Milan, and was well received.

Under the title of "Il Vascello Fantasma," Wagner's "Der Fliegende Holländer" is shortly to be produced at the Teatro Carignano of Turin. The same master's "Lohengrin" will be brought out this winter at the Pagliano Theatre of Florence.

Arrigo Boito, the composer of "Mefistofele," has nearly completed a new operatic work entitled "Nero."

A Telephone Company has established itself at Lisbon for the purpose of supplying private residents of the Portuguese capital with special wires in connection with the San Carlo opera of that town.

Friends in this country of Herr Carl Warmuth, junior, the present head of the music publishing firm of that name in Christiania (Norway), will be pleased to hear that that gentleman has just celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his connection with the business in the above capacity.

In an article on "The true condition of voice-production," contained in a recent number of the Cincinnati Musical Standard, the writer (Mr. Edmund J. Myer) maintains that "the English language is destined to become the language of the future in song as well as the language of literature and of commerce." In other words, English will become, in the opinion of the writer, the universal language dreamt of by many. This may or may not be so. In the meantime, as far as "song" is concerned, several rival claims to the distinction are not unnaturally advanced by neighbouring nations, amongst them by the Germans. It must, therefore, be a severe shock to the susceptibilities of the latter to read, as we have just done, the following paragraph in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik of the 22nd ult., viz.: "At a performance of Wagner's 'Tannhäuser,' under the direction of Herr (we are unfortunately ignorant of the exact Danish equivalent for Mr.) Swendsen, at the Court Theatre of Copenhagen, Anton Schott sang the title-rôle in the English language, in deference to the wishes of the public, who declined to have their ears offended by the hated German tongue." Herr Schott, as we in London are aware, is a versatile artist, who could equally well have mingled the Italian version of his part with the mellifluous Danish of his coadjutors, and the preference given on the part of the Copenhagen audience to the English language (interpreted by a German), is a distinct compliment paid to this country, and a preliminary step, no doubt, in the direction indicated by Mr. Myer of the Cincinnati Musical Standard.

Hubert Ries, a distinguished member of the well-known musical family of that name, and younger brother of Ferdinand Ries, the pupil of Beethoven, died on September 14, at Berlin, having attained the mature age of nearly eighty-five years. The deceased artist was for many years past a highly esteemed violinist at the Berlin opera. He was the author of a very meritorious "Violin School for beginners," and an eminent teacher and successful composer for his instrument, whose quartet evenings formed at one time a distinct feature in the musical life of the Prussian capital. In 1839 Hubert Ries became a member of the Berlin Academy of Arts. One of his sons, Louis Ries, has been the second violinist of the quartet party at our Popular Concerts since their establishment, in 1859.

His Excellency Botho von Hülsen, General-Intendant of the Berlin Theatre Royal, died at the age of seventy-one, on September 30 last. Herr von Hülsen, who was formerly a lieutenant of the Guards, has occupied the arduous position of chief director of both opera and drama at the above establishment for a period of thirty-five years, and his régime has been distinguished on the whole by energy and tact in circumstances where the possession of these qualities becomes a matter of the first importance. Count Hochberg, the Protector of the Silesian Music Festivals, the composer (under the pseudonym of H. Franz) of an opera "Der Wahrwolf," and of several orchestral works, has been appointed Herr von Hülsen's successor.

The death is announced at Brussels, on the 15th ult., of Francesco Chiaromonte, a native of Sicily, the composer of several operatic works, and for the last fifteen years a professor of singing at the Belgian Royal Conservatoire.

The death is also announced at Paris, on the 18th ult., of Joseph Fidèle Koenig, a professor of singing, and formerly an esteemed tenor singer at the Opera.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Those of your readers who know Dublin will be fully aware that there is no city in which "the musical season" is more clearly defined. In summer, save for a flying visit from the Italian Opera singers, music is fast asleep in Dublin, for the simple reason that all those who patronise such entertainments are out of town. The musical season in Dublin does not really begin till November, when everyone has returned. There has been some discussion from time to time upon the question whether or not Dublin may be termed, either in the past or present, a musical city. That is a matter which, of course, is open to much difference of opinion; but, for my part, I am inclined to hold the affirmative of the question.

I am old enough to recollect Dublin for many years, and to remember musical influences in our city that have passed away. I do not desire to take the rôle of Laudator temporis acti, but I have very happy recollections of some of our Dublin musical réunions, to which, perhaps, "distance lends enchantment." I believe of all our old musical societies, but one survives—namely, the Hibernian Catch Club, a society always famous for its glee singing, and where you may, to this day, hear the inimitable productions of Calcott, Webb, Attwood, Stevenson, and many other English composers, performed in a manner worthy of such compositions. The fact that we possess two Cathedrals in Dublin has been of great assistance to such societies, their choirs always affording a sufficient number of well-trained vocalists for good glee singing. Perhaps amongst the most noted and admired of our Dublin musicians of thirty years ago were the Robinson family, all of whom were connected with our Cathedrals—John was organist of St. Patrick's, while Frank (tenor), Joseph (baritone), and William (bass), were members of both Cathedral choirs. I have listened to them all often with intense pleasure. I do not think I ever heard any vocalist—and I have heard a great many—whose rendering of sacred music was so devotional as Frank Robinson's. William Robinson was a pure basso profundo, to whom double D was no trouble, and although without the artistic feeling of his brother Frank, was an admirable singer. Joseph Robinson was an excellent baritone, who aimed higher as a musician than his brothers, and whose musical culture was very apparent in his vocalisation. Of this remarkable musical family, whose names were "household words" in Dublin for many years, Mr. Joseph Robinson (of whom I shall speak hereafter) is now the only survivor. Amongst amateur vocalists in the past I should mention the name of the late Mr. John Stanford (father of our gifted countryman, Charles Villiers Stanford), who possessed a bass voice of great depth and volume, which he used with much skill; of Mrs. Hercules

MacDonnell, a brilliant soprano, who was quite competent to sing the most difficult cavatinas of Rossini and Bellini; and of Mrs. Edward Geale, a remarkable contralto, whose voice was of such a peculiar quality as to enable her to sing many of the tenor songs of the operas, transposed, and who, I am thankful to say, is still with us, and able to this day to charm her hearers.

But there is yet another name which connects the past music of Dublin with the present, and which it would ill become any one professing to speak of Dublin musicians to omit—I mean Sir Robert Stewart, Organist, for many years, of both our Cathedrals. As an organist, I venture to say that he has no superior. Of course, this will be put down to Irish boasting by many of your readers, who cannot realise the idea of a first-class organist remaining in Dublin; but I have little doubt that if they heard him they would change their opinion. Apart from his talent as an organist, he is an accomplished musician, and I have no doubt many of his compositions are well known to most of your readers. Amongst the music of the past I should also refer here to what were, to my taste, the most enjoyable Concerts we ever had in Dublin. I mean the Concerts of the Dublin Glee and Madrigal Union. This was a glee party composed of Mrs. Scott-Fennell (contralto), and Messrs. Helmsley (alto), Peel (tenor), Richard Smith (baritone), and Kelly (bass), members of our Cathedral choirs. I regret to say death has removed Dr. Peel and Mr. Smith from a party which gave so much pleasure to the musical public of our city.

But about the music of the present in Dublin. It is quite true, as Mr. Graves has said, there have long been two great musical needs in our Irish metropolis—namely, a large Concert Hall and a permanent Orchestra. The first of these is now supplied by the erection, on the site of the old Theatre Royal, of the splendid building known as the "Leinster Hall," capable of seating 2,000 people. The orchestra, I trust, will follow. Of choral societies in Dublin, the Dublin Musical Society conducted by Mr. Joseph Robinson, whom I have already mentioned, is the principal. This Society performs great choral works in an admirable manner. Mr. Robinson has had much experience of the bâton and is admittedly a first-rate Conductor.

There is another choral society in Dublin, the University Choral Society, conducted by Sir Robert Stewart, the chorus of which is chiefly composed of the undergraduates of Trinity College, and who give three Concerts in the year.

There is also a choral society, without orchestra, conducted by Sir Robert Stewart, The Glee Choir, which gives very pleasant concerts, the choral pieces being chiefly madrigals and part-songs, which are very creditably performed, and relieved by vocal and instrumental solos.

Besides these there are numerous small societies, one amongst which, the Harmonic Society, deserves special mention from the fact that it confines its work to classical subjects, the compositions of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, &c., which, with a small chorus of fifty voices, it performs with much care and effect at its annual Concert. This Society is under the able direction of Mr. J. C. Culwick, Organist to the Chapel Royal, himself a composer of considerable ability, and a man of much culture, musical and literary.

During last season a series of excellent Popular Concerts was given at the Rotunda and Antient Concert Rooms, at which both Dublin professionals and English and foreign musicians performed, Mr. Collisson, a clever pianist and a rising musician, conducting. Although these Concerts were popular in price (the unreserved seats being one shilling) the music was generally of a good class (sometimes entirely classical), and it is a hopeful sign that they were generally well attended by an appreciative audience. We have also for several years had a series of Chamber Concerts of instrumental music, at which quartets, trios, and duets by the best composers are admirably performed by Herr Lauer (a German), violin; Mr. Rudersdorf (a Dutchman), violoncello; Signor Esposito (an Italian), piano; and Mr. Griffith (an Irishman), tenor. Mr. Rudersdorf fills the place of Herr Elsner, whose melancholy death a few years ago was so deeply felt in Dublin, and is a 'cellist of the first order, both for tone and execution. Signor Esposito is, as far as I am a judge, one of the best pianists I have ever heard, and while competent to perform the great works of Beethoven, Liszt, Chopin, and Rubinstein, is equally at home in the delicate combinations of the stringed trio. I may mention that there is also an Orchestral Union in Dublin, but I do not think it has been much of a success.

Having now given you some idea of our musical doings in Dublin, will you permit me to make one or two remarks upon the article from the pen of Mr. C. L. Graves, which appears in your October number, on the subject of "Musical talent in Ireland." With much of Mr. Graves's observations I concur, and I think they show a practical acquaintance with the country not possessed by most critics upon Ireland; but I must say I think they are written in anything but a friendly spirit. I do not see why, because one Irishman chooses to make ridiculously exaggerated statements respecting music in Ireland, it is necessary for another to undertake the task of her disparagement in this regard. Admittedly and especially in art "comparisons are odious," but surely it is not fair to compare the artistic progress of music in this poor and distracted land, with its progress in wealthy, comfortable England.

One great fault it seems to me underlying Mr. Graves's criticism of musical talent in Ireland, is that he compares the music in the present, when there has been such advance in music culture, with the music of the past generation. He says Lover's melodies were "conventional" and his accompaniments "infantile." The same charge might be made against most of his English contemporaries, but I think those who know his verse and music will agree with me in thinking them a most happy combination, full of poetic feeling and pure sentiment. Lover, although full of humour, yet, like other humourists, had his serious and pathetic side, which will be found in his "Songs of the Superstitions of Ireland." Although it is very much the fashion now to despise all that our ancestors admired, I think Mr. Graves will find few to agree with him in his low estimate of Moore as a national poet. As a lyrical poet I see no living writer to compare with him in beautiful simile and musical measure. It is quite true that the Irish melodies have lost terribly by being put into modern garb (chiefly, in my opinion, by the adoption of the modern minor), and nothing could be more miserable than their arrangement, both accompaniment and symphonies, by Sir John Stevenson; but this is attributable to the musical habit of the day, and the conventional kingdom in which the writers lived. However, the fact remains that Ireland has a national music, the growth of centuries, which England has not; and no failure in the arrangement of such music will affect the fact of its existence.

In speaking of Irish composers, Mr. Graves omits to mention the name of Wallace, the composer of "Maritana," and Rooke, composer of "Amilie, or the Love-test," both excellent works, but which it would be unfair to compare with compositions of the present day, when there has been such an advance made in musical culture. Had Balfe written at the present time, no doubt his compositions would have taken a very different form, and would not be open to the unfriendly criticism to which they are often subjected. That Ireland is more likely to achieve musical distinction by individual eminence than high average excellence I admit, and also that her failure in the latter arises from want of that co-operation which is a necessity of all harmony, not only musical, but social.

I am, Sir, yours truly,

HIBERNICUS.

Dublin, October 14, 1886.

[Owing to my absence in an out of the way corner of Ireland at the end of September, and to the delay caused by a change of whereabouts, the revised "proof" of my paper was forwarded too late for the editor to insert all the corrections which I had made, one of which had reference to the new "Leinster Hall," a building which so satisfactorily supplies a pressing need. But apart from minor inaccuracies I am bound to admit that in one important point I have used language which, did I not plead ignorance, would convict me of prejudice. Impartial witnesses of unimpeachable authority in such matters have assured me that in adverting to the lack of a first-rate Irish chorus I have been guilty of grave injustice towards the excellent choir of the Dublin Musical Society and its veteran Conductor, and that had I been present, for example, at such a performance as that given last season by this society of Dr. Stanford's "Three Holy Children," it would have been impossible for me to have written as I did. With a great deal of what "Hibernicus" has to say about music in Dublin, and in particular as to the high level of amateur talent in that city, I am entirely in accord. Thus it was my good fortune as a boy often to hear Mr. John Stanford, the Lablache of Dublin amateurs, so fine were his voice and style, so inimitably rich his humour. With regard to Moore and Lover, my position, were it fully stated, might perhaps commend itself more to your correspondent than he imagines. It would be impossible to deny the former's remarkable lyrical gift, though, for my own part, I am heretical enough to prefer his less known satirical poems; but, in view of his life and surroundings, to claim him as the national poet of Ireland, as Burns can be claimed for Scotland, has always struck me as an unjustifiable proceeding. To Lover I denied the right to be considered seriously as a composer, and few will maintain that his music is not immensely inferior to his words. Still, in expressing the desire to see his songs re-edited, I intended to pay him a higher compliment than I would offer to any other composer that I know who relies chiefly upon the humorous side of his art. Wallace I purposely avoided all mention of, from the peremptory way in which he is claimed as a Scotch composer by the most recent authorities—vide Mr. Brown's "Dictionary of Musicians." Of Rooke, to my shame, I confess that I had never heard.—C. L. GRAVES.]

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—My attention has been called to a letter on "Irish Musical Talent" in the October number of your journal, signed C. L. Graves. I have not the pleasure of Mr. Graves's acquaintance—indeed, I may say, without meaning to give offence, that I have never even heard of that gentleman, nor do I know what his opportunities have been of forming an opinion on the subject of which he treats. But as one of the oldest members of the Irish musical profession, I feel that I cannot allow this letter to pass without making a few comments.

Though I agree in the main with Mr. Graves's views, I do not think that in the matter of detail he has done justice to Irish musical talent. In reviewing the achievements of individual Irishmen in the domain of music, he has made more than one strange omission. He has not named Vincent Wallace, who was a first class violinist, an exceedingly brilliant pianist, but who is still better known to the world as the composer of "Maritana" and "Loreley"; and, coming down to our own time, he has made no mention of the Professor of Music to Trinity College, Sir Robert Stewart, whose learned and most effective works, written for the Dublin Cathedrals, are well known, who has written a clever operetta and many part-songs, and who is, in one style, an unrivalled organist.

Mr. Graves adverts to the lack of a first-rate chorus in Dublin. I would ask Mr. Graves if he has ever heard of the Dublin Musical Society. Its choir consists of 300 selected voices; it has been in existence for ten years, during which time nearly all the great works have been produced at its Concerts. With respect to the artistic finish of the choir, I would refer Mr. Graves to some of the first-class artists who have frequently appeared at the Dublin Musical Society—such as Mr. Santley, Madame Trebelli, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Annie Marriott, and Mrs. Hutchinson. As to the orchestra it would be idle to assert that we have such a thing in this country. For the Concerts of the Dublin Musical Society we have always to import members of Mr. Hallé's band, or members of Mr. Stockley's band at Birmingham, and the expense which this entails is a very heavy burden on the Society. I might mention that the cost of the band at the production of "The Redemption" and Stanford's "Three Holy Children" was within a fraction of £150 for each Concert for a band numbering less than sixty performers.

The chief causes which, in my opinion, combine to make it so difficult to maintain a good orchestra in this country are, the indifferent musical education, the poverty of the country, and the utter indifference shown by the aristocracy and wealthy mercantile class of this city in the advancement of musical art in Ireland. Until these causes disappear, we cannot expect that either patriotism, which is satisfied with brass bands, or an entente cordiale between the chief musical authorities, which exists scarcely anywhere, will remove this reproach.

While on the subject of musical education I would refer to Mr. Graves's suggestion that a really efficient Academy of Music should be established in Dublin; with that suggestion I heartily concur, and my experience proves that it is a crying need in this city. Since the Dublin Musical Society was founded I have refused admission to several hundreds of applicants, including a large number of the pupils of the Royal Irish Academy of Music, owing to their inability to read music at sight with anything like correctness. However, this is a matter which I hope will in time be remedied.

Within the last twelve months, when it was proposed by a scheme in the Court of Chancery to hand over the Coulson musical bequest, amounting to the sum of £17,000, to the Academy of Music, a meeting of musical professors, numbering nearly forty, was held, at which I occupied the chair; with few exceptions the leading members of the musical profession in Dublin were present, and a statement expressing the opinion of the meeting that the administration of the Academy was inefficient and unsatisfactory was adopted. Owing, no doubt, to the action of the musical profession on this occasion, the Royal Irish Academy of Music have taken the necessary preliminary steps to reconstitute themselves, and have shown their readiness to adopt many of the suggestions made at the meeting above referred to. In their reconstituted form, and with the aid of the Coulson bequest, I see no reason why there should not be in Dublin, within the next few years, a really efficient Musical Academy.—Faithfully yours,

JOSEPH ROBINSON.

ROCKSTRO'S "THE GOOD SHEPHERD."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In your notice of my Oratorio, "The Good Shepherd," in THE MUSICAL TIMES for October, you speak of my fugal treatment as "faulty." As the accusation has been repeated in other periodicals, and re-echoed in a highly exacerbated form in an American journal, I trust you will permit me to say a few words in reply to it.

I venture, then, to maintain, that every interval, without exception, in my fugal answers, is written in strictest possible accordance with the rules laid down by the greatest masters of the art of fugue, and that, having constructed my answers in obedience to those rules, I am left, by the same great masters, perfectly free to treat them, either with the simple harmonies of the tonic and dominant, or with the harmony of the dominant of the dominant, as I please, the exhibition or omission of the last-named harmony—involving a formal modulation to the key of the dominant by means of a new leading note—being a mere accident, neither commanded nor forbidden by the laws of modern fugue,* though, in either case, perfectly compatible with them.

It is impossible to dispute the truth of this position, in presence of "Das Wohltemperirte Clavier," in No. xvii. of which Bach treats his fugue without any form of modulation whatever, while in No. xxvii., he treats it with a distinct modulation to the key of the subdominant.

I repeat, therefore, that the method of treatment I have adopted in "The Good Shepherd" is perfectly orthodox in its theoretical aspect, while I can scarcely believe that, if it had proved ineffective in performance, the choruses in which it occurs would have been described in the Times as "two magnificent fugues."

I remain, Sir, your obedient Servant,

W. S. ROCKSTRO.

P.S.—Since writing the above, I have received a letter from the Professor of Music at the University of Oxford confirming my position.

* By "modern fugue," I mean, of course, the form of fugue practised since the abandonment of the ecclesiastical modes.

[Mr. Rockstro has a perfect right to hold his opinion with regard to the answer of his fugue, if he will only allow us the same privilege. The rule that the answer should be in another key than the subject is one which has been handed down to us from the best authorities, and we beg to say that Mr. Rockstro's answer is not in another key. We need scarcely say that we can be in no degree influenced by the assertions of other critics.—The writer of the Notice.]

THE SIAMESE NATIONAL HYMN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—While on the subject of national hymns, the following amusing incident, related by the late Mr. Markus, Conductor of the excellent Statesmusik (the Viceroy's band) at Batavia, may be of some interest to your readers. In 1871, when the King of Siam visited Europe, he resolved to call at Batavia. Long before the time of his expected arrival, great preparations were made; the King of Holland had given orders that his Siamese Majesty should be received with royal honours, and that no expense should be spared. Mr. Markus, of course, anticipated that, as usual, music would take a prominent part in the ceremonies, and that, no doubt, among other things, the Siamese National Hymn would be required. No one seemed ever to have heard of such a hymn; but the Conductor, recollecting that some time before, a music publisher at Rotterdam had advertised a volume containing a pianoforte arrangement of the national hymns of every country, ordered it, and sure enough there was the Siamese Hymn among the others. Although Mr. Markus had some slight misgivings regarding the genuineness of the piece, he arranged it for his orchestra, and as it was of a somewhat outlandish character, he trusted to his good luck to have found the right thing.

Shortly before the King's arrival, the official programme for his reception was published, and Mr. Markus saw that on the King's entry his band was to play the Dutch National Hymn. Not liking to have his light hidden under a bushel, he went to Government House and asked for explanations. He was told that as no one had ever heard of a Siamese Hymn, the most appropriate tune would be the Dutch National Melody. Mr. Markus replied that he had procured the Siamese Hymn, and that his band would be able to play it on the occasion of the King's arrival. The aide-de-camp was much pleased to hear this, and said he believed the King would consider it a very polite attention. There was a réunion at the Officers' Casino the next day, and the Siamese Hymn was asked for; it had to be repeated twice and delighted every one present.

At last the King arrived. The Governor, with a brilliant staff, went on board the Royal yacht to welcome His Majesty. On their stepping on board an excellently trained Siamese band saluted them with the Dutch Hymn. After the exchange of official civilities, one of the officers expressed his admiration of the performance of the Dutch Hymn by the Siamese band, and asked if he might be permitted to hear the Siamese Hymn also. This request, however, could not be complied with, as, up to that time, none of the European bandmasters had succeeded in harmonising that strange tune according to European harmonic laws. The Governor, however, remarked that his bandmaster had succeeded in doing so, and was in a position to receive His Majesty on landing with the Siamese Hymn arranged for European instruments. The King was surprised and much pleased. He said it had long been his great wish to hear his native melody played by a European band, and he should be glad to be allowed to have copies made out at once for his own band.

The next morning the King came on shore. The band was stationed in front of Government House, and as the King's carriage came near, the Siamese Hymn was struck up; it sounded beautiful in the clear, still morning air, causing a feeling of profound satisfaction to Mr. Markus. As the carriage passed the King stared hard at the Conductor, which the latter took for a sure sign of the excellent effect the hymn had produced on his Majesty. In the evening Mr. Markus went to Government House to conduct a Concert. On his arrival he was told that the Chamberlain had already enquired several times after him. He went at once to that gentleman, whom he found in great agitation. "For heaven's sake, my dear Markus," said he, "what have you done? The King is much annoyed; in fact, he thinks a trick has been played him. After being told yesterday that our band would salute him with the Siamese melody, he hears to-day a strange piece of music which, he says, has not a single note of the Siamese Hymn in it! Tell me what you can do to get out of this scrape, and wipe out the bad impression which the band has made? Moreover, I should like to know where you got that fictitious tune from." After the perplexed Conductor had explained to him what we know already, he asked him to obtain the King's permission for him (Mr. Markus) to visit his yacht, and he would try to obtain there from the native musicians the genuine melody, and, if possible, arrange it for performance at the grand parade which was to take place the day after the morrow. The Chamberlain shrugged his shoulders, but promised to obtain the necessary permission.

There was now no time to be lost. Early the next morning Mr. Markus went on board the yacht, and by an interpreter made his wishes known to the band. At first they were unwilling to comply with his request, but when he explained that he did not wish to hear a complete performance, but merely to have the melody played to him, a clarinet player was willing to do as he desired. Mr. Markus nodded down the melody quickly, returned on shore, and set to work to harmonise it. It was a difficult problem, but after several unsuccessful attempts he completed the task, arranged it for his orchestra, and handed the score to an experienced copyist. Next morning at six o'clock the band met, and although they had only just time to go through the piece once, every one was much struck with the strange, solemn, but agreeable character of the music. Punctually at seven o'clock the King, accompanied by the Governor and suite, drove to the parade-ground, and Mr. Markus, for the second time, led his band to perform the Siamese Hymn. In his anxiety he hardly dared to look up at the procession. His musical honour seemed to him to depend on the success of the tune, but he was soon told that the King must have been favourably impressed, for in passing he took his hat off three times. The Chamberlain also, who passed with the Crown Prince in another carriage, nodded approvingly to Mr. Markus. In the evening there was a State banquet, and after the band had played a couple of pieces the King desired to hear the hymn again. It was played, and he and the whole assembly listened standing. Mr. Markus concluded by saying "Rarely has anything in music caused me more anxiety than the Siamese National Hymn." As a reward Mr. Markus received from the King the Order of the Siamese Crown, and the band a present of one thousand dollars.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—It is not often that these two widely different faculties get into opposition, but they do sometimes. A recent medical work, "Hygiene of the Vocal Organs," by Morell Mackenzie, M.D., professes in its preface not to deal with this subject authoritatively from a musical point of view. Yet on pp. 53, 54, 55, and 113, several musical terms are most dogmatically defined, and on page 131 there is a great deal said about the judicious use of a boy's singing voice during the transition period—whilst it is breaking, in fact. There can be no doubt, but that such remarks as these, coming from so eminent a medical authority as Dr. Morell Mackenzie, are likely to do mischief. The majority of eminent singers and teachers of singing take the opposite view.

I can myself, in my own case, strongly testify to the injury done to my own voice from following advice exactly similar to that given by Dr. Mackenzie. It is surely a great pity that he did not leave purely musical subjects alone, especially after saying that he has "no pretension to speak with authority as a musician."—Yours, &c.,

TONIC SOL-FA MINOR SCALE.—CORRECTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I am much indebted to Mr. Gould for calling my attention to an inaccuracy in my letter on this subject, printed in the September number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, p. 548, col. 2, line 10, where I had inadvertently given the notes of A \flat major instead of E \flat major. Lines 10 and 11 should run thus—"consists of A \flat E \flat B \flat F C \sharp G \sharp D \sharp and has, in fact, only one note, F, in common with C minor." The last paragraph of my letter is correct. It was intended to point out that the sharpened F \sharp , G \sharp , of the key of A \flat minor, were notes in the tonic major of A \flat . In my last letter in the October number, p. 614, col. 2, line 18 from bottom, for Umkehrung read Umkehrung.

Truly yours,

ALEXANDER J. ELLIS.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ALERTON, NEAR BRADFORD.—On Saturday evening, the 16th ult., an Organ Recital and Sacred Concert took place at the Baptist Chapel, on the occasion of the opening of a new organ, built for the Chapel by Mr. J. J. Binns, of Brimley. Mr. C. E. Melville, of Leeds, the Organist, chose an excellent programme, every item of which was well rendered. A small choir, under the conductorship of Mr. Illingworth Roberts, sang some choruses with much effect, and Miss A. Cockcroft, a local soprano, was highly successful in all her solos.

BACUP.—The Orchestral Society gave the first Concert of the season on the 16th ult. The vocalist was Miss Bessie Holt, who won much applause for her three songs. Mr. de Jong made his first appearance in this district as solo flautist; Mr. Cudworth played two violin solos, besides acting as Conductor.

BECKENHAM.—The first Concert of the Vocal Union for the present season, was given at the Public Hall on the 6th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of sacred, and the second of secular music. The singing of the Union was exceedingly good; and special mention must be made of Miss Katherine James, R.A.M., who was in all her vocal solos most warmly and deservedly applauded. The other principal singers were Miss Annie Buckland, Mr. Henry Yates, Mr. Walter Wells, and Mr. H. De Brent, all of whom were received with much favour. Mr. W. Morell conducted with his usual ability.

BEIGHTON, NEAR SHEFFIELD.—On Monday, the 15th ult., a Concert was given by the St. Mary's Church Sunday Scholars, at the Board School, in aid of the school funds. The first part consisted of the "Musical Assoc.," which was excellently rendered by the scholars. The second part was miscellaneous, and comprised a Pianoforte Trio by Misses A. Fairburn, E. Peake, and A. Moody (scholars), songs and part-songs by scholars, all of which were thoroughly successful. Mr. Arthur Hayes was Conductor, Rev. E. Keynolds, M.A., chairman, and Mr. J. G. Bickell, accompanist.

BIRKENHEAD.—On Thursday evening, the 14th ult., a Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held in Holy Trinity Church, Price Street. Special services were given by the choir under Mr. Billie Porter. The anthem, "Ye shall dwell in the land," by Dr. Stainer, was beautifully rendered, the solos being taken by Master Quail and Mr. Armstrong. After the Benediction had been pronounced, Arnold's Te Deum in C was sung by the choir with marked effect. The services were continued on the following Sunday.

BLACKPOOL.—There was a large attendance at the Winter Gardens on Saturday, the 9th ult., the programme containing good instrumental selections for the fine orchestra, conducted by Mr. Klippe, and vocal solos for Miss Bessie Holt, who, by her excellent singing, thoroughly sustained her reputation. Mr. Hewitt (bassoon), Mr. H. Forster (cornet), and Mr. Dowling (clarinet) also contributed solos with much success.

BOLTON.—On September 25, the Eagle Choral Society performed Barnett's Ancient Mariner.—The first of a series of Popular Concerts was given in the Temperance Hall on the 16th ult., when the building was crowded in every part.—Weekly Recitals upon the Town Hall organ have been submitted by Mr. W. Mullineux, the Borough Organist, but they have not been very well attended.—The Choral Society held its first meeting for the winter on the 12th ult., the first part of Elijah and The Golden Legend being the works selected for rehearsal.

BRADFORD.—On Thursday evening, September 30, the Special Harvest Thanksgiving Services were commenced in St. Paul's Church, Manningham, by a performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah (first part). The large professional choir of the church was augmented to 120 voices by the addition of some seventy members of the Bradford Festival Choral Society, under the skilful conductorship of Mr. James H. Hooks (the Organist and Choirmaster of St. Paul's Church). All the choruses were excellently rendered; the solos, the voice of Mr. Robert M. Munt, of Manningham, in the part of Elijah, Mr. Charles Blagbro, and Mr. Newton-Laycock, singing the music allotted to them with much fervour and reverence. Mr. W. T. Crossley (an apprentice of Mr. Hooks') accompanied very ably upon the organ. On the Sunday following (the 3rd ult.), the services were continued, and the choir sang Gadsby's "Blessed be the name of the Lord," and Hatten's "Blessed be the Lord my strength" (the important solo in the latter composition being effectively sung by Mr. Newton-Laycock). The solo parts of the Te Deum were sung by Macfarren, Atkinson, and Hooks, and in all the music of the day, the choir successfully upheld the reputation it has so well won. To Mr. Hooks, the Choirmaster and Conductor, much of the musical success was due.

BRIGHTON.—A complimentary Concert, for the benefit of Mr. Robert Taylor, was given by his pupils and the members of the Brighton Sadler Harmonic Society, in the Dome, on Thursday, the 7th ult. The principal vocalists were Misses K. Norman, D. Fuller, M. Bond, and Darlington; Messrs. F. W. J. Ford, F. J. Wilmhurst, C. H. Buckman, F. Clements, G. Marten Barling, and G. Percy Cooper. There was a full choir and an admirable orchestra, led by Mr. W. Baker. Mr. J. Spearing presided at the harmonium, and Mr. Taylor conducted. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous, and the second consisted of Barnett's Ancient Mariner.

BURNLEY.—The organ in the Parish Church was opened on September 26, when large congregations attended. The choir was thoroughly efficient throughout the services, which respectively included Matins: Stainer's "Sing a song of praise." Evensong: Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (in G major) by St. John's, Burnley. The choir sang the Lord's Prayer, righteous (Matins) and the selection from the works of Mendelssohn, Archer, and Silas, was afterwards given by Mr. Cruickshank, Mrs. Bae, the Organist and Choirmaster.—The fourth Festival of the Burnley Rural Deanery Choral Association was held in the Parish Church, on the 2nd ult, when thirteen choirs from Burnley and the neighbourhood took part in the service. The choir was under the conductorship of Mr. Cruickshank, Mrs. Bae, and the capabilities of the newly repaired organ were effectively displayed by Mr. R. Watson (Holy Trinity). The special hymns were sung to tunes by Barnby, Monk, and Cruickshank; the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A (Arnold); anthem, "The Lord is my strength" (Smart); and the Gloria in E-flat major, credited to the choir. The choir sang The Vocal Union, under Mr. Cruickshank, recommenced rehearsals on the 6th ult, Spohr's Last Judgment being selected for the first Concert.

A very successful Harvest Festival was celebrated at Holy Trinity Church on the 10th ult., under the direction of Mr. R. Watson, Organist. Gounod's "The King of Love" was the anthem at Evensong. Mr. Fred Vetter's Band (Manchester), rendered various pieces from the Mendelssohn and Schumann repertoires to a large audience in the Assembly Room (Mechanics' Institute), on the 13th ult., before and after the presentation of addresses to H.R.H. Prince Albert Victor, K.G., on the occasion of his visit to open the Victoria Hospital.—An Organ Recital was given by Mr. John E. Gaul, A.R.C.O., Organist at St. Matthew's, Burnley, on the 14th ult. The recital consisted of a number of pieces, which were rendered at intervals by local artists, was much appreciated by the audience.—Encouraged by the success of a former attempt, the children of Ebenezer Schools gave two performances of Root's Cantata The Flower Queen, on the 16th and 18th ult., the soloists being assisted by Mr. Arnold, the organist, and singing, evened out by the accompaniment rendered by a small band.—The Harvest Festival celebrated in Burnley Parish Church, on the 24th ult., was very numerously attended. The service at Matins and Evensong was Stainer in B flat; at the latter, the favourite hymns "Come, ye thankful people, come" (processional), "The power of Jesus Christ" (anthem), and "The fields are fruitful" (canticle) sung by the large congregation, and the anthem "We shall dwell in this land" (Stainer), was rendered with due expression by the choir.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—The Harvest Festival Service in connection with St. Mary's Church was held on the 7th ult. The service was sang in E flat, and the anthem comprised the recitative and air, "Straight opening," "Now Heaven in fullest glory" (sung by Mr. Frederick Pattle), and the chorus, "The heavens are telling" (Creation). The choir, which was augmented by members of the Choral Society, gave an excellent rendering of the service throughout, reflecting much credit upon the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. T. B. Richardson.

CALCUTTA.—Mr. Ernest Slater's first Concert in the Town Hall, on September 7, was a decided success. Mr. Slater gave ample evidence of his expression and delicacy of touch in his pianoforte selections, and he was ably supported by several talented amateurs, Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer being well rendered by a choir of between forty and fifty voices, and the solo excellently sung by Mrs. Davies.

CHICHESTER.—There was a fairly numerous audience in the Assembly Room on Thursday evening, the 14th ult., upon the occasion of Mr. E. H. Thorne's Pianoforte Recital. The first part of the programme comprised selections from the works of Beethoven—Sonata in G, Sonata in F minor, and Grand Sonata in B flat. The second part was devoted to the writings of Chopin. Mr. Thorne's performance proved a great treat, and he was frequently and warmly applauded.

CREWE.—Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, an evening Ballad Concert was given in the Town Hall, on Tuesday, September 28, by the following artists:—Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Susetta Fenn, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, Mr. John Ridding, vocalists, and Miss Margaret Gyde, solo pianist. The programme contained an excellent selection of songs, duets, &c., which were well rendered and thoroughly appreciated. Mr. Sinclair Dunn conducted.

DARLINGTON.—Harvest Festival Services were held in St. John's Church, on Friday, the 15th ult., and the following Sunday. At Evensong on Friday, the anthems were "Great is the Lord" (Sydenham), and the Gloria from Mozart's Twelfth Mass. The music on Sunday was similarly festal in character. Mr. C. Stephenson, A.C.O., ably presided at the organ, and played with much effect Andante con moto in F (Bunnett), "Marche Heroïque" (Jackson), Easy Prelude for soft stops (Smart), Harvest Thanksgiving March (Calkin), Andante in D flat (Wély) and Russian March (Clark).

DOUGLAS, ISLE OF MAN.—The musical season at this popular watering place has been one which, for brilliance, is unparalleled in its history. In respect to the number and professional rank of the artists engaged, the palm must unquestionably be awarded to Derby Castle, which, as a musical centre, has, under the management of Mr. J. Turner, H.R.H. Prince George of Cambridge, reached the height of its popularity. The Conductor of the band was Mr. Charles Reynolds, the oboe player, a talented member of Charles Hallé's band, the orchestra of the Royal Italian Opera, &c. Amongst the vocalists who have appeared at the Concerts may be mentioned the following:—Mr. J. L. Turner, Mr. Seymour Jackson, Mr. Eaton Batty, Mrs. G. Cantor, Miss M. R. Cantor, Mr. Backlock, Mr. W. C. Braggins, Mr. Baughn Foote, Mr. Iver McKay, Miss Pattie Winter, Miss Bessie Holt, Miss Breakenridge, Madame Marie Andersen, Madame Laura Smart, Madame Annie Albu, Madame Marian McKenzie, Miss Clara Leighton, Madame Marie Sutton, &c. Already engagements are being made for the coming season, and it is hardly too much to say that, possibly, exceed in interest that which has just closed. The season in the Isle of Man opens with Whitsun-week and closes in September.

DUDLEY.—At the distribution of prizes of the Mechanics' Institute, on September 28, the pupils of Signor Martinengo gave a well selected programme of vocal and instrumental music. The young artists were received with much favour, and there were several encores.

ENFIELD LOCK. The Government Church, which has been closed for enlargement, was re-opened on the 7th ult., with full Choral Service. Special Psalms were sung to a chant composed expressly for the occasion by Dr. Stainer, and the service was Stainer's in E flat. The choir, consisting of 12 voices, have sung with purity and fullness of tone. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Garry, Vicar of Reading. After the Benediction, Dr. Stainer's setting of the "Amen" was sung, and also the Hallelujah Chorus. The whole of the music was rendered with great care and precision by the choir, under the direction of Mr. E. J. Stainer, who has, during the service, efficiently presided at the organ, which has been enlarged and reconstructed by Messrs. Hill and Son.

EAST GRANTON, MARLBOROUGH.—On the 17th ult., a new organ, the gift of the Marchioness of Aylesbury, was formally opened in the church by Mr. T. B. Richardson, Organist of St. Mary's, Bury St. Edmunds. At the conclusion of the afternoon service, Mr. Richardson gave a lengthy Recital of high-class organ music, which was listened to with marked attention and pleasure by the very large congregation present. By special request, Mr. Richardson gave a second Recital in the evening. The organ—which contains two manuals, sixteen stops, and two and a-half octaves of pedals—was built by Messrs. Bevington and Sons, London.

FAVERSHAM.—A crowded congregation assembled at 8.15 Church on Thursday evening, the 14th ult., for the opening service of the Harvest Festival. The service was fully choral, the music being rendered by the Festival choir, numbering about 200 voices, with organ and orchestral accompaniments. Tallis's Responses were sung, the Proper Psalms were chanted, the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were taken to the organ, and the hymns were sung to the accompaniment of the Lauda Sion, in addition to which there were several harvest and general thanksgiving hymns. The latter were especially well rendered, the body of vocal power, combined with the organ, brass, and stringed instrumentation producing a grand effect; and the hymns selected, such, for instance, as "We plough the fields and scatter," "Now thank we our Lord and God the Father, Christian soldiers," "Sing well to the Lord," were heartily joined in by the congregation. The offertory, which amounted to £12 16s. 8d., was for the Kent and Canterbury Hospital.

HEDNESFORD.—The annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held in the Parish Church on Sunday, the 3rd ult. At the morning service Sir John Goss's "Te Deum in F and Benedictus in A" were sung, the anthem being "Great is the Lord," by Sydenham. In the evening Dr. C. Stegall's setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in G, with the anthem "Praise the Lord, O my soul," by Mr. Marshall, were excellently rendered by the choir under the direction of Mr. Neal. The Organist of the Church (Mr. Ernest Lindop) presided at the organ. The concluding Voluntary at the evening service was the Hallelujah Chorus (Handel).

Hove.—Mrs. C.E. Pertwee and Miss Bertha Moore gave their annual Soirée Musicale in the Town Hall, on Monday, the 11th ult. The programme comprised two Operettas, An Artists' Proof, by Harriet Young; and Who's the Heir? by Virginia Gabriel, which were exceedingly well rendered. Mrs. Pertwee and Miss Moore were assisted by Mr. G. Thorne, Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, and Mr. Leigh-Bennett, vocalists; and Miss Harriet Young was an efficient accompanist.

IRVINE.—Mr. Hinchliffe, Organist of the Parish Church, gave his annual Organ Recital on the 15th ult., in presence of a large audience, the choir of the church, under the leadership of Mr. Allan, aiding with vocal selections. The programme was excellently rendered.

LEICESTER.—A complimentary Concert was given at the Temperance Hall on Saturday, the 9th ult., under the direction of Mr. J. Addison Adcock. There was a band of 100 performers, and the vocalists were Mrs. Mason, R.A.M., Mr. Alfred Page, Mr. H. T. Clarkson, and Mr. Donald McAlpin, all of whom ably acquitted themselves. Mr. McAlpin played Handel's Organ Concerto in G, with band accompaniment, Miss Jessie Lilly contributed a violin.

cello solo, and Mr. Walter Waddington a cornet solo. Mr. J. Garver solo presided at the pianoforte, the orchestra was conducted by Mr. Ascock, and Mr. John Kilby acted as leader.

LONDONERRY.—The Harvest Festival was held at St. Augustine's Church, on Friday, the 8th ult., before a large congregation. The choir was under the direction of the Organist, Mr. George Wilby, who also played suitable voluntaries. The anthem, "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works" (Simper), was effectively rendered, as indeed were all the musical portions of the service. Mr. J. Woods was the solo vocalist.

LOUTH.—A successful Concert, in aid of the funds of the National Schools, was given at the Town Hall before a crowded audience on the 14th ult. The programme composed of local amateurs played the overture to Rossini and the accompaniment to Mendelssohn's First Pianoforte Concerto (Finale), the solo of which was well rendered by Miss Richardson. The following ladies and gentlemen also gave their services: Mrs. Porter, Misses Chaplin, M. Chaplin, Johnson, E. K. Colam, F. Colam, and Dalison; Rev. R. Meddip; Messrs. Jones, Feneley, Packer, Harris, Gresswell, and Spry. Mr. Rysdale led the orchestra, and Mr. Henry Horner officiated as Conductor.

MACCLESFIELD.—The first Concert of the Philharmonic Society was given on the 19th ult. The programme consisted of a Cantata, For and by J. W. Jackson, performed by the principal vocalists, Mozart's Twelfth Mass, and songs by the principal. The vocalists were Mesdames Lily and Jessie Marshall-Ward, Mr. J. Mellor, and Mr. W. Riley. Mr. Hawkins conducted, and Mr. Jackson presided at the organ during the performance of his Cantata.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—On the 13th ult., the eighteenth annual Service of Song by the Wesleyan Methodist Choirs of Northumberland and Durham, was held in the Town Hall, Alderman W. H. Stephenson, J.P., presiding. The choir numbered 1,000 voices. The Chairman gave a short address, congratulating Dr. Rea on the honour recently paid him, and saying that the Wesleyan Methodist Service of Song had become not only an annual festival, but an established institution amongst them. The programme was then proceeded with. The whole of the anthems and hymns were sung without a hitch, and perhaps the piece in which the choir was heard to best advantage was the chorus from the Messiah, "All ye like sheep." The soloists were Misses Letitia Tomlinson, Mr. T. H. Armstrong, and Mr. Robert Grice, of St. Paul's Cathedral Choir. The new hymn "Thy way, not mine, O Lord," composed by the Organist of Clarence Street (Mr. J. M. Gibson), was received with applause. Mr. J. B. Bowes conducted, and Dr. Rea presided at the organ.

NEWRY.—An Organ Recital was given in St. Mary's Church on the 22nd ult., by the Organist, Mr. Barry M. Gilholy. The programme included Grand Offertoire in G major (Wély); Overture, "Occasional Oratorio" (Handel); the "G. H. Fugue" (Bach); Grand Solemn Mass (H. Smart); Larghetto from the Clarinet Quintet (Mozart); Air, "Nazareth" (Gounod); and a Larghetto and Introductory Voluntary (B. M. Gilholy). The church choir sang the Hallelujah Chorus, from the Messiah, and "Lovely appear," from Gounod's Redemption.

NOTTINGHAM.—Miss Fannie Lynn gave a most successful Concert in the Albert Hall on Wednesday evening, the 20th ult., assisted by Miss Kate McKrill, Miss Dora Bright, Mr. A. Thompson, Mr. Musgrove Tufnall, and Master W. H. Square.

NUNEATON.—On Thursday, the 17th ult., the Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held in St. Mary's Abbey Church, and the Festival Service was repeated on the following Sunday. The musical portions of the services were well rendered by the choir. Three anthems were sung during the Festival, also three settings of the Te Deum, Magnificat, and Nunc dimittis. The whole of the music was given under the direction of Mr. John Ding (Organist of the Abbey), who presided at the organ throughout. The offertories (which were good) were devoted to church expenses. Handel's Hallelujah Chorus (Messiah) was played by the band and organ at the close of each service.

RATHFARNHAM, DUBLIN.—The annual Harvest Festival was held in the church on the 10th ult., when the following music was sung: Te Deum, Stewart in D; anthems, "O Lord, how manifold" (Barbry), "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Stainer), and "Ascribe unto the Lord" (Travers). Two members of St. Patrick's and Christ Church Cathedral Choir sang the verses in the offertory anthems. The sermons were preached by Rev. F. R. Wynne, M.A., and Maurice Neliga, D.D., the latter of whom, in preaching for the Choral Fund, remarked that, "without exception, the choir of Rathfarnham Church was the best in the Diocese of Dublin." Mr. W. A. Collison, Mus. B., presided at the fine organ of the church, and conducted the musical portions of the services.

RETFORD.—The organ at the Parish Church, East Retford, which has been thoroughly renovated by Messrs. Brindley and Sedgwick of Sheffield, was opened on the 5th ult. with a Recital by Mr. Hamilton White. The programme—which included works by the most eminent composers for the instrument—was listened to with much interest; and the ability of the performer, as well as the excellent qualities of the organ, were displayed to the utmost advantage.

SAISBURY.—The Harvest Festival was held in St. Thomas's Church, on Thursday, September 30, when, in addition to the organ, a full orchestra was stationed in the chancel and accompanied the service with excellent effect. Gadsby's setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis was sung by the choir, numbering fifty voices. "In splendour bright," from the Creation, and the chorus "The Heavens are telling," from the Creation, Mr. South (the Cathedral Organist) presided at the organ, and the Organist, Mr. Augustus Aylward, conducted. There was an overflowing congregation.—The Test Valley Musical Society gave the first Concert of the second season, in the Hamilton Hall, to a large and fashionable audience, on Thursday afternoon, the 21st ult. The first part of the programme was devoted to a performance of Cherubini's Requiem Mass in C minor, which was exceedingly well rendered. The second part comprised several songs, madrigals, and choruses, also Haydn's String Quintet, "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," Cherubini's Overture ("Lodoiska"), and two charming violoncello solos by Mr. Whitehouse. The solo vocalists were Miss Paget, Miss B. Milford, Mr. John M. Hayden, and Major Colebrooke Carter. Mr. Alfred Bost, who was the leader of the orchestra, and the Rev. E. H. Moberly (son of the late Bishop) ably conducted. The Concert was repeated at Winchester with increased success on the afternoon of the 22nd ult.

SLIGO.—The fourth Annual Festival of Choirs for the diocese of Elphin was held in St. John's on the 12th ult. Nine choirs took part, numbering over 130 voices. Evenson was sung at 3.30 p.m., the anthem being "A day in Thy courts" (Macfarren). The sermon was preached by the Rev. C. Owendin, B.D., Rector of Enniskillen. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. A. T. Froggatt.

SOUTHSEA.—An Organ Recital was given on the 14th ult. by Mr. Charles Behr, R.C.M., Leipzig, at Elm Grove Chapel. The programme contained selections from Mendelssohn, Merkel, Beethoven, Bate, Flotow, Wely, and Liszt, the most attractive being the Overture to Stradella and Beethoven's "Heroic" Symphony, which had both been arranged for the organ by Mr. Behr. The quiet, unassuming manner in which the greatest difficulties were performed proved Mr. Behr to be a genuine artist, and his efforts were highly appreciated. Miss Jones and Mr. Banks were the vocalists.

SOUTHWELL.—The Lay Clerks of the Cathedral gave their annual Concert on Tuesday, the 12th ult., in the Concert Hall, before a large audience. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Daglish, Mr. J. Dawson, Mr. E. Longmore, Mr. W. Whitham, and Mr. Bingley Shad, solo pianoforte, Miss Calvert; solo violoncello, Rev. R. F. Smith; violin and accompanist, Mr. A. Marriott. The Concert was in every respect a decided success, one of the features of the evening being the fine glee singing of the Lay Clerks.

SWANSCOMBE.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held on the 10th ult. at All Saints' Church. The music comprised the Te Deum and Communion Service in F (Dykes), anthem, "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Dr. Stainer). The services, which were full choral, were well rendered. Voluntarys, selected from the works of Gounod, Mendelssohn, &c., were admirably executed by Mr. T. H. Jarvis, Organist and Choirmaster.

TREDEGAR, MON.—On Thursday evening, the 14th ult., a performance of Haydn's Creation was given by the newly formed Choral Union, the large hall, capable of holding 1,500 persons, being filled in every part. Mr. I. J. David (late of Llandaff Cathedral) conducted, and the band was under the direction of Mr. E. T. Roberts, Cardiff. The principal vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Mr. Montague Worlock, and Mr. J. F. Miller, all of whom were highly efficient. Mr. G. Garding, Organist of St. George's Church, was the accompanist. The proceeds are to be devoted towards the funds of the Union.

WELLINGTON, N.Z.—The Harmonic Club gave its second Subscription Concert of the season, on August 5. The programme comprised Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, and J. F. Barnett's Cantata The Building of the Ship, both of which were well rendered. The soloists were Misses Campbell, Gore, Williams, Hamerton, K. Hadfield, and Richmond; Mrs. Barron; Messrs. Hichon, H. Page, F. V. Waters, and Shaen; Mr. Rous. Marten conducted. Benedict's Oratorio St. Peter, is to be produced by this Society.—The splendid organ recently imported from Messrs. Lewis, the famous English builder, and erected in St. John's Church, Willis Street, was publicly opened on September 3 by Mr. H. Wells, Organist of St. Michael's, Christchurch. The programme was well selected and excellently rendered. The vocalists were Mrs. Greenwood, Mrs. Parsons, Mr. Waters, and Mr. E. J. Hill.

WEST BROMWICH.—Dr. E. W. Taylor, F.C.O., gave an Organ Recital in the Town Hall, on Monday, the 4th ult., before a large audience. The programme, which was excellently rendered, contained selections from the works of Handel, Merkel, Batiste, Liszt, Smart, Lemmens, and Guilmant.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. C. A. Robinson, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Andrew's Church, Aycliffe, near Darlington.—Mr. S. E. Harford, to St. Paul's, Clerkenwell.—Mr. James Bellamy, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Anne's, Upper Norwood.—Mr. Fred. Winkley, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Anne's, Eastbourne.—Mr. W. E. Neck, to St. Anthony's, Globe Road, E.—Mr. Henry G. Mead, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Stephen's Church, Buckhurst Hill.—Mr. Basil H. Philpott, Organist and Choirmaster to Her Majesty's Chapel Royal, Hampton Court Palace.—Mr. Frank T. Lowden, Organist and Director of the Choir to Christ Church, Weymouth, Dorset.—Mr. Arthur J. THE "CONCERT" AND "PROFESSOR" VIOLINS.

Messrs. RIVIERE and HAWKES beg to inform Professors of the Violin, and Players generally, that they have made an arrangement with one of the best French Violin Makers to manufacture, for them specially, two New Styles of Violin, to be named as above. Messrs. RIVIERE and HAWKES believe that they are supplying a long-felt want in introducing these Instruments to the Musical Public, for, up to the present, it has been almost impossible to buy a really good and carefully-made Instrument suitable for Orchestral and Solo French or German copies; those in the market being mostly cheap and of a moderate price; and of no real value. The Instruments we now bring forward are carefully made by experienced workmen, some of whom have given their knowledge in the workshop of the celebrated maker, J. B. VUILLAUME. This will at once establish the fact that these instruments are worthy of attention.

They are carefully made on the lines of the great Italian makers, and there is no doubt that they will increase in value if care and attention is bestowed on them. In appearance they are quite new, and remarkably handsome, a new Oil Varnish, which the maker has invented, being exclusively used on these Instruments.

THE "PROFESSOR" VIOLIN.

Suitable for Teaching and Orchestral Playing.

Picked Wood, Oil Varnish £2 2 0
Superior, fine Oil Varnish, and specially selected Wood and Fittings £3 3 0

THE "CONCERT" VIOLIN.

Specially made by the most skilled Workmen, and eminently suitable for Solo Playing.

Picked Wood, Oil Varnish £4 4 0
Superior, fine Oil Varnish, and specially selected Wood
and Fittings £6 6 0

To an Artist or Soloist requiring a really perfect Instrument, nothing better can be bought than this Violin, and we have every confidence in recommending it. To Players residing in the country, or in the Colonies, this is specially recommended, as being the only way in which they can secure a perfect Instrument and really good value for their money.

Orders from the Colonies will receive special attention, and every care will be taken in their execution.

NEW CANTATA.

THE MAID OF ASTOLAT

DEDICATED TO PROFESSOR SIR GEORGE A. MACFARREN.

Produced at the Wolverhampton Festival, September 16, 1886,

THE LIBRETTO WRITTEN BY DESMOND L. RYAN

COMPOSED BY

C. SWINNERTON HEAP.

Price 4s. net, in paper cover; in paper boards, 5s. net; bound in scarlet cloth, 6s. net.
Chorus parts, 1s. each net.

A PART FOR THE HARMONIUM, BY MR. WINDEYER CLARK, IS IN COURSE OF PREPARATION.

PRESS NOTICES.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

DAILY NEWS.

"Dr. Heap's composition is one of considerable excellence. . . . The lyrics are gracefully set, and the concerted music is of an interesting character. The first trio in the composition is especially noticeable as being one of the best numbers in a work which in various places displays much imagination. The chorus-writing is good, and, considering the interest of the story which forms the plot, the new work should be a decided success."

STANDARD.

"An excellent beginning was made yesterday with 'The Messiah'; and in the evening Dr. Heap's new Cantata, 'The Maid of Astolat,' challenged judgment with an emphatically successful result. . . . Dr. Swinnerton Heap's music is artistic throughout; and there is a tenor scene, superbly sung by Mr. Edward Lloyd, which promises to oust the hackneyed 'Lend me your sword' and Walther's Preislied out of the field."

THE QUEEN.

THE ATHENÆUM.

"This brings us to the consideration of the music, in which there is much that calls for praise. In a technical sense it is, indeed, without flaw, the musicianship being throughout of the highest class. . . . If it is impossible to describe 'The Maid of Astolat' as an effort of genius, we can at least admit its right to a place in a festival programme. It exhibits talent, learning, and excellent taste, and the new compositions are few in number, of which more can be said. Naturally the performance was good, as the orchestra and chorus of course exerted themselves to the utmost to do honour to their excellent conductor, who must have been fully satisfied with the rendering of his work and with its reception by the audience."

MONTHLY MUSICAL RECORD.

"Dr. Heap's music shows an adhesion to the accepted forms, but there is no evidence of slavish copying of the ideas of others. The choral writing is of great excellence, and the whole is remarkable for finished workmanship. There are two grand scenes, each sufficient to establish the reputation of the work. . . . The work was splendidly performed, and completely successful, the composer meeting with well-merited and long-continued applause from audience and performers."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

"One cannot but observe the excellence of the workmanship throughout. There is no slipshod writing, no appearance of haste or carelessness; but the composer proves himself in all a master of his craft. . . . The conclusion of the Cantata gave rise to a scene assuredly never before witnessed in Wolverhampton. Dr. Heap was cheered to the echo, and, being recalled, was the recipient of a most enthusiastic demonstration of delight from audience and performers. He thoroughly deserved his success, for his work is of first-rate merit."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY GAZETTE.

"There is no hazard in the statement that the production of 'The Maid of Astolat' will make the seventh Wolverhampton Festival ever memorable. That Dr. Heap's latest music is far in advance of anything he has written before is unquestionable; and it may be said that it is as good as anything of its kind that has been written since Sterndale Bennett wrote his 'May Queen' for Leeds, or Henry Smart wrote his 'Bride of Dunkerron' for Birmingham. It begins finely, and the quality is maintained to the end. There is not a poor number in it, but there are many numbers of irresistible power and beauty, which none but the most unappreciative can fail to admire."

WOLVERHAMPTON EXPRESS.—SPECIAL MUSICAL CRITIC.

"Neither time nor opportunity serve for an ultimate judgment on this an essentially dramatic work; but this much I can assert, and that is, that it must lift Dr. Heap very near the front rank, and, if he could but be persuaded to put it in form for its proper habitat, the stage, it would hold its own against any grand opera of this generation."

MIDLAND EVENING NEWS.

MUSICAL STANDARD.

"It would be but small praise to describe the work as 'scholarly' or 'musicianlike'; from a writer so learned and so refined, scholarly and musicianlike work was to be expected. The scene 'Twas Lancelot, traitor false,' reveals genuine dramatic power, and the chorus, 'Hail to great Arthur,' which follows, shows what can be done when a skilful musician uses choral writing with a clear and well-defined purpose. . . . Judging from the score, 'The Maid of Astolat' brings Dr. Heap to the front rank of English living composers, and whether regarded with respect to the end in view, or as music per se, this Cantata must be welcomed as a work of the first order in its kind."

This work is now being published by subscription, and will be clearly printed (with an independent staff for the pedals throughout) upon 250 full music size pages of the usual Organ oblong form, in one edition only, viz., the three separate parts.

The subscription may be for either part, or for all, as follows:—

Part 1 10s. 6d. net post-free.
 Part 2 5s. 3d. net post-free.

Part 3 7s. 6d. net post-free.
 Or Parts 1, 2, and 3 together 21s. net post-free.

When the subscription list is closed the work will only be obtainable at the marked net price.

The majority of the pieces will be of rather an easy nature, intricate combinations of the manual and pedal parts being carefully avoided, and, in order to facilitate playing, fingering and pedal marks will be plentifully given. This will make the 36 Short and Easy Voluntaries particularly useful to young students, and for teaching purposes, as the master will be spared considerable trouble in making guiding marks for a pupil, and the latter will be less likely to go astray when practising alone.

It is hoped that the 22 Postludes will supply an acknowledged want of a set of concluding voluntaries for divine service, that will not make unreasonable demands upon the player, and yet at the same time will be fairly solid and effective.

The whole work is mostly set for organs of two manuals; for though the third manual is not forgotten, it is borne in mind that most instruments in this country have two manuals only, and that while pieces written for two manuals can always be played upon one having three, those written for three cannot so easily be played upon two, for which indeed they require adaptation and re-arrangement, thus giving an Organist something else to manage in addition to the execution of the piece.

It is generally acknowledged that close printing makes the reading of music a more difficult task than when it is more clearly spread out.

By allowing the music ample space upon the plates this is to be obviated.

Subscriptions or subscribers' names (quoting church appointment if any) should be at once sent to the Composer, BURLINGTON VILLA, UNDERHILL ROAD, LORDSHIP LANE, S.E., so as to be in time for the List of Subscribers which it is hoped to publish.

To those who send in their name only, a notice will be sent when the work is ready, and on the receipt of their remittance it will be posted to them.

HARK THE HERALD ANGELS SING

(WITH ILLUSTRATED TITLE)

Being an Introduction and eleven Variations for the Organ upon Mendelssohn's well-known Christmas Hymn Tune. In this piece the Variations are not dependent upon each other, therefore where the whole-piece is not required, a selection of the easier Variations can be made, and in place of the last Variation the Hymn might be sung.

VOCAL SCORE, OLD NOTATION, TENTH THOUSAND.

RUTH

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"Ruth is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musically—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"Ruth has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

"Full of flowing melody."—Salisbury Times.

ON SEVEN OCCASIONS.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s.; ditto, paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 4s.

THE HOLY CITY

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"To show the great popularity of Mr. Gaul's Cantata, 'The Holy City,' it may be mentioned that the rendering at Salford Mission Hall, on Friday last, was the fortieth in Birmingham and its immediate environs since its production."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

"The work is an honour to English art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work this is 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The Holy City" is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; ditto, paper boards, 3s.; ditto, scarlet cloth, 4s.; Voice parts, for the use of Choral Societies, each 1s. A Selection of Soprano and Contralto Movements for School Use, 1s. 3d. Band Parts on Loan. Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s.

TWELVE VOCAL DUETS FOR SCHOOL USE

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL

(Composer of the "Holy City," "Ruth," &c.)

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, 'April,' and No. 5, 'May,' are our special favourites, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where sisters or friends delight in joining voices. The pianoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary pianist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

SAINT LUDMILA

AN ORATORIO

JAROSLAV VRCHLICKÝ

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

ANTONÍN DVOŘÁK.

(OP. 71.)

Vocal Score, Octavo, paper cover	5	0
" " paper boards	6	0
" " cloth, gilt	7	6

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"St. Ludmila" became a popular favourite immediately. It was a case, as between the audience and the music, of love at first sight. Number after number elicited enthusiastic applause, and the composer-conductor, received with cheers on taking his place, left it the hero of a triumph.

DAILY NEWS.

The applause at the end was as great as that showered down when the first part concluded; and after acknowledging the plaudits, Dvořák had again to return, led on this time by Sir Arthur Sullivan. Clearly then, no work could have had a more flattering verdict passed upon it at a first hearing.

LEEDS MERCURY.

LONGFELLOW

JOSEPH BENNETT

ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

Vocal Score, Octavo, paper cover	3	6
" " paper boards	4	0
" " cloth, gilt	5	0

THE TIMES.

"The Golden Legend" roused genuine enthusiasm. It is pleasant for the critic to be for once in full accord with the vox populi.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

A greater, more legitimate, and more undoubted triumph than that of the new Cantata has not been achieved within my experience.

STANDARD.

In speaking of the music which Sir Arthur Sullivan has added to Mr. Bennett's admirable libretto, I have nothing but praise—and praise the most emphatic—to offer. From first to last the hand of the master is apparent; and the united musical forces, instrumental and vocal, have been turned to a proper account.

ATHENÆUM.

Not one of his earlier Cantatas can compare with "The Golden Legend" in abstract beauty or even in finish of workmanship. This is high praise, but we bestow it without the slightest hesitation.

LONDON & NEW YORK: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

PRODUCED AT THE LEEDS FESTIVAL, 1886.

THE

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

THE LIBRETTO WRITTEN BY

JOSEPH BENNETT

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

Vocal Score, Octavo, paper cover	3	0
" " paper boards	3	6
" " cloth, gilt	4	6

In point of dramatic force and suggestiveness few examples of modern art are stronger than "The Story of Sayid."

STANDARD.

"The Story of Sayid" takes immediate rank as an art work of the very highest class.

MORNING POST.

ATHENÆUM.

As Sayid does not return, the Princess, who has offered herself as his hostage, has to prepare for death, and this gives occasion for a solemn march, which is one of the best things of its kind we have met with for some time. It is no easy matter to write an original march, joyous or funeral; but Mr. Mackenzie has succeeded in the task, and he has scored it in a masterly way.

THE GLOBE.

"The Story of Sayid" not merely adds to the already high reputation of its composer, but does honour to native art.

PRODUCED AT THE LEEDS FESTIVAL, 1886.

THE REVENGE

SET TO THE POEM OF

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON

BY

C. VILLIERS STANFORD.

	s.	d.

THE TIMES.

If "The Revenge" does not become widely popular among choral societies it will be to the loss of those societies.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

A work for which there is a widespread popularity in store.

DAILY NEWS.

In a word, Mr. Stanford has written a vivid, powerful, patriotic, and masterly work of its class, which has commenced what must prove a long career of popularity.

THE GLOBE.

The work is full of beauties from beginning to end, and will greatly enhance the reputation of the composer, who directed this performance, and at its conclusion was twice called for, and greeted with enthusiastic and fully merited cheers.

ATHENÆUM.

That the work will be immensely popular with choral societies and the public there cannot be a shadow of a doubt.

YORKSHIRE POST.

We think it may safely be predicted that this choral ballad will become a favourite study with provincial musical societies.

NOTICE.

The Staff now being complete, no more applications for Professorships can be entertained.

By order of the Committee,

CHARLES P. SMITH, Secretary.

Aldermanbury, November 18, 1886.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

Prospective arrangements for the present Session:—December 21, Lecture; January 11, 12, 13, Examinations; 25, Lecture; February 22, March 22, Lecture; April 18, Annual College Dinner; May 24, Lecture; June 28, Lecture; July, 12, 13, 14, Examinations; July 26, Annual General Meeting.

A COMPETITION for the MEADOWCROFT MEMORIAL PRIZE ANTHEM is hereby announced: the amount of the Prize to be Eight Guineas; the works sent in are to be full Anthems, and the words are to be selected from the Holy Scriptures or Book of Common Prayer.

The Anthem sent in should be short or of moderate length, taking about five or six minutes in performance, of such a character as would make the successful work suitable for parochial use, and likely to gain general acceptance as an effective piece, and withal not a difficult work to perform.

The MSS. must be sent in on or before March 1, 1887.

This competition is open to all composers.

A Prize of Eight Guineas is hereby offered for an Organ Composition suitable as a Postlude for Divine Service, occupying from about six to ten minutes in length.

Through the kindness and liberality of the Hon. Treasurer, M. E. Wesley, Esq., a Prize of Five Guineas is also offered for the best Prelude or Introductory Voluntary to occupy about four or five minutes in performance. MSS. for these competitions to be sent in on or before March 1, 1887.

Members of the College who are eligible to compete for the Prelude and Postlude Prizes.

Conditions will be sent on receipt of stamped envelope.

E. H. TURPIN, Hon. Secretary.

MR. ARTHUR ROUSBIEY (Baritone), at Mr. DE JONG'S CONCERT, Manchester, October 23. "In three songs of various character, Mr. Arthur Rousbiey displayed an excellent voice, with intelligence and refinement of style."—Examiner.

"Mr. Arthur Rousbiey is very good on the stage, and he is equally at home in the concert room. His stage experience enables him to sing with much effect. He sang Shield's old song 'The Wolf,' with commendable vigour, and had to repeat a portion of it."—Courier.

"Mr. Arthur Rousbiey is best known in Manchester as an operatic singer, but he proved himself quite as welcome last night as when singing in character. Shield's old song 'The Wolf' is very hackneyed, but Mr. Rousbiey managed again to arouse enthusiasm, which the song has so often before evoked. Nor was Mr. Rousbiey less successful in his other selections."—Guardian.

"For Mr. Arthur Rousbiey I have nothing but praise. His singing is distinguished by much refinement, and he uses his fine voice in a thoroughly artistic manner."—Southport Standard. "Mr. Rousbiey's singing was of a very high order, and he certainly created a most favourable impression on his auditory. Mr. Rousbiey's operatic study showed itself with grand effect in 'The Wolf,' which he sang with fine dramatic effect; the audience was so delighted that they demanded an encore; he complied with their wishes by a partial repetition."—Toddmore News.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

DECEMBER 1, 1886.

A NEW HISTORY OF MUSIC.*

Few more original contributions to musical literature has appeared of late years than the "History of Music" of which we propose to give some account in the following paper. Indeed, the perusal of the opening sections gives rise to the suspicion—subsequently confirmed by a more extended acquaintance with the contents of the whole—that we have before us no mere hasty compilation, but the labour of a lifetime. However widely one may feel called upon to differ from the conclusions propounded therein, criticism is disarmed by the extraordinary width of reading, the unconventionality of method, and laborious piecing together of details which are revealed by a perusal of these pages. A book which is the outcome of years of study is not to be hastily skimmed and hurriedly reviewed, readable and attractive though much of it is. We have read a good deal of Mr. Rowbotham's first volume twice over and find that he stands the test, a result for which his admirably picturesque and cultivated style is no doubt largely responsible. A Balliol scholar is pretty sure to have the faculty of felicitous expression, and the author of this history is no exception to the rule. But his marshalling of facts and choice of illustrations, and, above all, his ingenuity in generalisation, are equally admirable. We have hinted above that we do not altogether hold with Mr. Rowbotham in his conclusions, many of which, in regard to the slender premises from which they are drawn, remind one of an inverted pyramid. But though we may withhold our assent, we cannot help admiring his subtlety and penetration. It is a stimulating thing to come across an author whose views are original, if fantastic, and who has the gift of clothing them in unhackneyed language or enforcing them in picturesque epigram. Ferret opus—the work is full of life, animation, and poetic spirit. The very bone whistle of our troglodyte ancestors is to Mr. Rowbotham fraught with meaning and interest. His digressions are never tedious, but, on the contrary, are full of instructive matter and abound in strokes of humour. On the other hand, it is only fair to warn all readers who hold that a history should be primarily concerned with matter of fact, and to whom no amount of literary charm can atone for a deficiency of this commodity, that the first volume of this work is largely concerned with pre-historic music, and even in those chapters which treat of manifestations of the musical instinct among the elder civilisations, deals principally with "offers at the truth" and matters of conjecture. Where so much depends upon guess-work, it would be obviously inappropriate to assume a critical attitude. Rather is it our purpose to summarise as briefly as may be the result of Mr. Rowbotham's inquiry in the volume before us, passing very hastily over the earlier sections. After giving exhaustive evidence in support of his position that the three types under which all musical instruments are reducible—the drum, the pipe, and the lyre—are representative of three distinct stages of development through which pre-historic instrumental music has respectively passed, he proceeds to set forth the import of these several stages, availing himself largely of the analogies suggested by his remarkably wide reading in the literature of exploration and travel. His chapter on the "Drum-stage" contains his theory as to the ultimate origin of all instrumental music, which he traces to an effort on the part of man to reproduce the rhythmic sounds of nature. The mystery attaching to such sounds naturally led to reverence and fetish-worship, the various form of drum-worship being duly described in a series of vivid pages. Thence he proceeds to an account of the gradual growth of the actual instrument from simplicity to complexity, bringing home to us the painfully slow and laborious nature of this progress. It was long before hollowness came to be realized as a first condition of sonority. But a stroke of genius was required for the advance to the covering of the hollowed out log with a skin head. For then—by the union of the drum with dancing—"rhythm was ransacked to the very bottom," and the first step was taken towards the secularisation of religion into art; while by the further union of song with the drum, the value of expression would be recognised. How wonderfully savages employ their drums as a vehicle for their emotions, Mr. Rowbotham quotes from travellers like Catlin and Schoolcraft to show, adding "when man has only one instrument, he is master of it. The lasso of the Araucanian never swerves a hair's breadth from its object, the boomerang of the Australian never misses its aim. But with us, who have a thousand such things at our disposal, the pistol shoots wide, the revolver goes off before its time, the gun hangs fire, the patent sword-stick breaks. We are bunglers at a thousand things—they are adepts at one." In the chapter on the Pipe-stage, the genealogy of all wind instruments is traced back to horns or conchs used by savages in warfare, or as an alternative to signal horns or whistles, the aim in the former case being to strike terror into their foes by a "hellish sound"—and, indeed, it appears on excellent authority that the noise of Samoan conchs and Orinoco trumpets is quite terrific. From the observation of its effect upon mankind easily followed the employment of the trumpet to scare evil spirits. The louder the sound the more potent the magic, a belief illustrated by a delightful anecdote quoted from Baker's "Ismailia." "The old rain-maker at Laboré had only a whistle, but when Baker gave him a German horn fitted with brass, he grinned till the tears ran down his cheeks, and said: 'I am a great sheik now. There is no rain-maker so great as I.'" In the discussion of the origin of the flute, Mr. Rowbotham is at his best, his treatment of the subject being particularly noticeable for the happy and perfectly legitimate use which he makes of Mythology to support his views. As he well remarks, "the heart of legends is generally sound, though the body may be fancy work." Vocal music, which next claims his attention, must, according to him, have had a totally different origin from instrumental. It grew out of impassioned speech,* and the first influence at work to steady and correct the fluctuations of tone was that of story telling. But it was only by degrees that primitive man came to be able to sing a clear note—the Maoris to this day seem unable to do so—and that was probably G, which nearly all savage songs have for their key-note, while those savages who have only one note in their music always have G. Mr. Rowbotham adds, however, in a characteristic note—"Gardiner, who is the patriarch of all such speculations, would have preferred F. He conceived F to be the normal note of the human voice, and for the following reason: he used to go into the gallery

* It is noteworthy in this connection to observe how the history of the art repeats itself, and exponents of the most advanced views bid us be true to the ancient found of all song—speech, basing all vocal expression upon correct declamation. "Take care of the words and the tune will take care of itself," is hardly an exaggerated statement of the view of one of the greatest singing-masters of the day.

* A History of Music: By John F. Rowbotham. In three volumes. Vol. I. [Trubner and Co.]

of the Stock Exchange and listen to the hum of the voices beneath him, and he always found that the hum after some little time 'amalgamated perceptibly' into one long drawn note, which was always F." Readers of Berlioz's memoirs will not fail to be reminded of poor Jullien and his discovery of the diapason of Eternity, by stopping his ears and listening to the throbbing of his veins. The frequent occurrence of one-note phrases in primitive savage songs, and the natural genesis of song from declamation, point, according to Mr. Rowbotham, to the conclusion that the history of vocal music began with a one-note period. Then another and a third were added, by which time scope for melody existed. The great antiquity of the five-note scale predisposes Mr. Rowbotham to the belief that after the third, not the fourth, but the fifth and sixth notes of the diatonic scale were added. In support of this he adduces the fact that the fifth is the great interval in speech. To which we would reply that if this be so, it would be at least as probable that this leap should have been taken from the first or the second note, when song was more closely allied to speech than in the three-note period. However, it is evident by the modesty with which he propounds his solution that Mr. Rowbotham fully realises how hard it is to understand why the fifth was hit upon as the new starting point. As he puts it—"We may be sure that as little in music as in anything else has any spice of random got an entry. Every stitch of man's fair vesture teems with meaning. Each note in the gamut he has had a reason for." From a close consideration of the five-note scale and the races who use it, Mr. Rowbotham is led to believe in some mysterious connection between it and monosyllabism, and dubs their music Isolating, as philologists dub their language. And the parallel is permissible when, as he points out, we find that the Australians, primitive though they be, have got the seven-note diatonic scale and a richly inflected language, while the Chinese, highly civilised in many ways, have a language destitute of inflection—the one marked by Phonetic poverty the other by Phonetic wealth, which would affect the production of musical as well as linguistic sound. Passing over an interesting digression on the effect of dancing on song, which was to break up the chaos of sound into paragraphs or measures, and a long passage on the reciprocal influence of chant and dance in different peoples, we come to his ingenious theory of the origin of the minor scale. We are relaxed by grief, and in endeavouring to vent our grief in song would naturally sing flat. Furthermore, we would be most likely to fall short in the top notes where the chief effort lies. Now if we apply this to the two divisions of the five-note scale, and flatten the third and sixth, we have at once got the minor scale. As to the treatment of the seventh in the minor scale of savage tribes, Mr. Rowbotham cannot pronounce definitely, but inclines to believe that it was optional to flatten or leave it natural. Amongst the North American tribes instances of both forms occur. The succeeding chapter, on "Pipe Races and Lyre Races," is largely concerned with showing that the same antagonism of the sensuous and spiritual elements which has been observed to exist in savage vocal music, is found in their instrumental music also, the Polynesians and Papuans serving as notable instances of such antagonism. This distinction observed in a corner of the Pacific is repeated in the world at large, the conception of music among the Mediterranean races having always radically differed from that prevalent amongst the Mongoloids. "With the Mediterranean races music has been the handmaid of poetry and kept in subordination to language. With the Mongoloids, provided only they made a pretty jingle or a good stirring noise, were allowed to run into what excesses they pleased. The home of the lyre was the zone of the founders of religion and of the fathers of epic poetry. The home of the pipe was with the discoverers of macadamisation and tablet printing, the inventors of gunpowder and the compass, who amused themselves with pipe and drum after the business of the day was over. . . . Just as the geographers map out the world into wine countries and beer countries, or oil countries and butter countries, so might we well divide the races of the world into pipe races and lyre races, and view the history of music as the conflict and antagonism between two great styles. . . . Nor does one develop into the other, nor is one necessarily a higher level than the other, but they exist side by side in the world with a great gulf between. . . . Thus then may we look upon the musics of mankind, and as we shall find the case to stand at the zenith of civilisation, so have we found it to be with the savage. And to what cause shall we ascribe such antagonism, or how make it a valid one, unless we dive beneath the sheet of tissue which music spreads for us to walk on, and recognise in this opposition of styles the play of two great forces upon men—the sensuous and spiritual. And their effects, indeed, are better seen in other and perhaps higher things than music; but since they shine through all those manifestations of energy that together make up life, they are seen in our art no less than elsewhere." Very judicious is the reservation with which he closes the chapter after some further generalisations upon this antagonism: "Within races there are nations, and within nations there are individuals: tendencies imply reactions; and all sorts of extraneous causes concur to obliterate the original lineaments of the pure type." Chapter V. is devoted to the lyre-stage, to which he early insists some races were not fitted to rise. The lyre might be imported, but met with the usual fate of importations. Language proves that it was invented while Hamites, Semites, and Aryans still dwelt in the common Bactrian home of our primeval ancestry, and where we can still study it as handled by "the troubadours of Asia"—the Tartars. Upon the pages which deal with the growth of the instrument itself, and upon the origin of instrumental and vocal harmony, we need not comment, having already had occasion to call attention to them in these columns [see "The Origin of Harmony," August No.]. The import then of the lyre-stage, as summed up on pp. 170—182, was the absorption of music into poetry, which shows a great advance—from the savage, in fact, into the barbarian, and all barbarians had an overpowering passion for music, falling naturally into song in any moment of high nervous exaltation, as we learn from the pages of Xenophon, Aulus Gellius, Tacitus, and Strabo, aptly cited by Mr. Rowbotham. Music, too, was the great vehicle of instruction, and, in fine, its range was co-extensive with that of literature now. It was also a means of drilling the body (as amongst the Zulus of to-day, teste Mr. Rider Haggard), and lastly of educating the soul. The laws of the Celts and Gépidae were in hymns, while the bards of the Celts, Tartars, ancient Hindus, and Scandinavians were censors, moral guides, and diffusers of learning. Finally, all the mythical heroes who exerted a benign and humanising influence on their fellows were musicians—Osiris, Maneros, Orpheus, Amphion—"all step out of the frames of mythology and stand forth in their true character as law-givers and moral teachers." Music, then, at the dawn of history, was a life-speech; but by the time we begin to tread on the firmer ground furnished by the monumental records of Egypt, it was already an article de luxe, no longer answering a practical purpose in life, because superseded by the pen and cultivated by slaves. The chapters on the music of the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Hebrews, though perhaps the most characteristic and readable in the volume, lend themselves least to the method of summary which we have adopted thus far. Still, we cannot refrain from expressing our conviction that Mr. Rowbotham, in his ingenious speculations as to the nature of the music of the ancient Egyptians, has credited them with a greater harmonic development than the facts of the case would seem to allow. Sculptural records, however, place a great many interesting facts beyond doubt, such as that the performers were specially drilled and played from memory; that they performed before and during banquets; and that conductors were invariably present, which suggests that the music was not of a strongly marked rhythm. The historical summary of the character of Egyptian music, dynasty by dynasty, from Menes till the era of the Ptolemies, is very well done. Egyptian music, even at its best, held in it the sources of its own weakness. Its massive orchestral form of expression was "rather due to the architectural genius of the people than to any sublimity of musical feeling." To the educated Egyptian, music only connoted effeminacy, and it was not until he had become effeminate himself, that he took to it. In connection with the worship of Horus, a purer and nobler music seems to have prevailed, but by its esoteric form it failed to touch the people at large.

The chapter upon the music of the Assyrians is chiefly taken up with a curious account of the mathematical purpose which the notes of the scale answered in abstract science amongst the Chaldeans, furnishing them with a musical terminology for all the higher branches of calculation. In this department lies the service of Assyria to the history of the art; their music itself can have had little harmony in it, the great aim, both in voices and instruments, seeming to have been towards shrillness. In striking contrast to the martial and inflammatory music of the Assyrians was that of the Hebrews, wherein the triumph of the spiritual over the sensuous element was complete. Few instruments were used, and the voice was the chief of all. The peculiar influence which the genius of the Hebrew tongue would naturally exert on their song is very clearly traced, and the chapter closes with two quotations, one from Pentaur the Egyptian poet, the other from Habakkuk, in which the nobility of the former is eclipsed by the magnificent diction of the Hebrew singer. The section upon Chinese music is chiefly drawn from Père Amiot's treatise, and suffers from the lack of illustrations, as indeed does the whole book. There is a curious note on p. 288 which deserves quoting: "I always think it is characteristic of the high esteem in which music is held in China, that the first act of a usurping monarch is to destroy all the musical instruments in use under the preceding dynasty, for by so doing he imagines he most effectually destroys the traditions of the dynasty." But the strangest fact in connection with Chinese music is the existence, side by side, of two scales, one (chromatic) for instruments, the other (the five-note scale) for voices, which never cross, except when instruments accompany the voice, when they adopt the vocal scale. But voices never adopt the instrumental scale. They possess the diatonic scale, but only in theory, whereon Mr. Rowbotham acutely comments as follows: "Now in this inability to supplement knowledge by execution, this outrunning of the practical faculties by the speculative, we see a touch of the real Chinese character. The people who were acquainted with gunpowder but never invented a gun, who knew of the polarity of the magnetic needle and yet never thought of employing it as a compass, have also from unknown antiquity been acquainted with the fourth and seventh tones, whose insertion among the others procure the complete octave, and yet have never carried out the results of their knowledge into practical music, but have suffered all their songs to be written in the old isolating scale of five notes." Further on he utters a spirited protest against the folly of denying merit to, or denouncing as wrong, a musical system which our Occidental ears cannot possibly appreciate. "It is only our prejudiced ears, inured to one particular scale from childhood, that refuse to give a fair hearing to the [?] these] strains, as our eyes have until lately denied all merit to that wonderful luxury of colour and design which we call Chinese and Japanese painting." It only remains for us, in conclusion, to express our regret that the form in which this book is brought out is not more worthy of its contents. Here, if ever, is a work which ought to have been published as an édition de luxe. The absence of diagrams and illustrations is felt on every page, in spite of the author's vivid descriptive powers. The Greek quotations are very badly printed, and the constant use of an italic a from a wrong font instead of an alpha gives them a barbarous appearance. For one defect, however, the author is responsible. Generally punctilious in giving his references, he has in some cases left a blank where the page number should have stood. A serious consideration is suggested by the recent appearance of the second volume of this work, nearly double as large as that we have been discussing, and almost entirely occupied with the music of the ancient Greeks. Either Mr. Rowbotham will be obliged to deviate from his original design of completing his task in three volumes, or else he intends to treat of modern music in a very cursory fashion. Perhaps the ingenious author is "too fond of the dead"—as Berlioz said of Mendelssohn—to do justice to the living. But whatever the scope of the work, the portion already completed is a contribution of abiding value to the archæology of the art.

SIR HENRY ROWLEY BISHOP.

It is easy to carry the observance of centenaries to excess, and devote too much of present time and attention to the glorification of the past; but the custom has its uses, particularly when it saves from unmerited forgetfulness good names not of the first rank. Men like Beethoven and Mozart do not depend upon the keeping of times and seasons. They are always with us, under our eye, and within our hearing. We could not ignore them if we would. But there are dii minores of whose past existence we, amid the turmoil of modern life, need to be reminded, in order that they may receive in fit season the homage of our admiration, and the applause due to good work successfully accomplished.

On the 18th ult. those of us who keep an eye on the calendar saw that we had reached the hundredth anniversary of Henry Rowley Bishop's birth. "And what of that?" some may ask; while it is probable that many more regard the fact with complete indifference. Bishop is dead in a double sense to such people, because no longer an active force in music. His works for the stage, they say, are but names, conveying no meaning to the present generation; the concerted pieces and songs detached from them are less and less frequently performed, and the musician who undoubtedly filled a large space in the world of English art has shrunk, under the impartial influences of time, to the dimensions of a pigmy.

We are not going to claim more for Bishop than rightly belongs to him, but we must protest against the slap-dash criticism which ignores great qualities because the fashion in which they were exercised has passed away. The English lyric drama of Bishop's age has gone, the glee is fast becoming a matter of interest for musical archæologists alone, and the style of his songs is as dead as the dodo. Now it is our turn to ask "What of that?" There remain for appreciative notice the qualities which enabled Bishop to climb to the highest position. The man is separable from whatever in him and in his work was dictated by the taste of the day.

Some measure of the worth of Henry Bishop may be taken by noting well the position he held at a time of considerable musical activity. It is true that when he "flourished" there were few English composers of high rank, but the country was overrun by foreign music and musicians, with whom and with which native art had to contend at a disadvantage arising from a strong opposing prejudice. It says much for Bishop that he more than held his own against all comers through a long series of years. This English composer, at any rate, knew nothing of neglect. It was not his to experience the "hope deferred, that maketh the heart sick." On the contrary, from the time when, as a lad of twenty, he produced "Angelina" in the little theatre at Margate, Bishop rose to the highest popularity by leaps and bounds. Five years later, his "Circassian Bride" made the doomed theatre of Drury Lane (it was burned down the next night) echo with thunders of applause, and within twelve months from that time the composer, then twenty-six years old, was composer and director of the music at Covent Garden. Engaged first for three years, and then for an additional five, Bishop went on, in his high position, from triumph to triumph. Opera after opera flowed from his facile pen, among them not a few which are still represented amongst us by detached pieces, such as "Mynheer van Dunk," "Home, sweet home," and "Tramp, tramp." To the Covent Garden period belong the "Knight of Snowdon," "Guy Mannering," the "Slave," the "Law of Java," "Clari," "Maid Marian," "The Maid and the Magpie," and many others familiar by name, at least, to musical readers. These new works were, unfortunately, not the measure of Bishop's activity during the years under notice. We say unfortunately for good reasons. That was a time when the artistic conscience did not seem to exist. It was a time when anybody who could get hold of a noble work, and had the power to carry out dismal designs upon it, made no scruple about cutting away here, interpolating there, changing this and altering that by no other law than his own evil pleasure. Readers of Baron Max von Weber's life of his illustrious father may recall the account he gives of the manner in which "Der Freischütz" was presented after this fashion: "On the 2nd July, 1824, 'Der Freischütz' had been given at the English Opera House (now Lyceum Theatre) under circumstances of some excitement, and with considerable expectations. The success was very great. Expectations were completely fulfilled, and eventually far surpassed, in spite of the miserably-mutilated state in which the opera was given, with a weak orchestra, and generally defective execution. The celebrated tenor, Braham, had the tastelessness to introduce into his part an old German song, 'Good-night,' and an English polacca, while Miss Stephens, who first undertook the part of Agnes or Agathe, sang the well-known German ditty, 'War's velleicht um Eins,' instead of the duet between the two women, and the duet between Agathe and Max was sung to an entirely different composition. Covent Garden followed with a version no less crippled and deformed. . . . It may be said, however, that nowhere was the mutilation of Weber's music more madly and recklessly exercised than when arranged by the celebrated composer, Bishop, and played on the boards of Drury Lane under his unlucky auspices." The musical history of this time shows plainly enough that Bishop was one of the chief offenders against good taste and reverence. Many were the masterpieces hacked about by him—"Don Giovanni," "Figaro," "Il Barbiere," "Guillaume Tell," amongst others, passed through the fire unto the Moloch of adaptation, coming out scathed, distorted, and hardly recognisable. Let us charitably assume that Bishop, who was a composer himself, did all this against his own inclination, and because the task was a necessity of his position. Still, we must regret that a man so gifted ever mixed himself up with such doings. He should have left them to Tom Cooke and his congeners.

In 1813 Bishop helped to establish the Philharmonic Society, of which he acted as a director and sometimes conducted the performances. But his true place was in the theatre, and, in 1825, we find him at Drury Lane under Elliston, where he measured himself against Weber by composing "Aladdin" as a rival of "Oberon." In that encounter he came off second best, as was to be expected. Five years later, the indefatigable man transferred his services to the Vauxhall Gardens, for which he wrote, amongst a host of other things, the still-surviving song "My pretty Jane." In 1840 he was back again at Covent Garden, under Madame Vestris, and there produced his last opera, "The Fortunate Isles." Concurrently and subsequently Bishop discharged other important functions. He conducted for a short time the so-called Lenten Oratorios; wrote a Cantata, "The Seventh Day," for the Philharmonic Society; assumed the Music Chair at Edinburgh in 1841, and that at Oxford in 1843; for eight years conducted the Antient Concerts; wrote an Ode for the installation of Lord Derby as Chancellor of Oxford University; and composed an Oratorio, "The Fallen Angel." He died, still in harness, two years after the Oxford Ode appeared.

We have given the foregoing details less as a biographical sketch than as evidence towards the conclusion that this man was of no ordinary mould. An examination of Bishop's music does not belie the testimony of his career. It is eminently English music—there is, or was, such a thing—English in the character of its melody and in its general contour. It aimed to be nothing more, and the composer had his reward in the full appreciation of his countrymen, to whose taste he ministered. As years went on, and the classical music of Germany rapidly gained ground amongst us, Bishop fell behind. His compositions were relegated to the rank of that which belongs to the "people" rather than to art, and before he died the poor musician saw the current of taste and opinion setting rapidly away from him. But wherever the appreciation of pure English melody survives there Bishop does not lack admirers. "Lo, here the gentle lark," "Should he upbraid," "Sleep, gentle lady," "Blow, gentle gales," and a dozen others which might be named—these things are still in favour among the masses, and, scarcely less, among connoisseurs who do not limit their admiration to works of the latest fashion. They contain the precious qualities of true music, which, however modes of utterance may change, are the same to-day as they were yesterday, and as they will be to-morrow.

We lay these remarks before our readers as not unbecoming the hundredth occurrence of a day that gave to English music one of its brightest ornaments; following thus in the wake of our contemporary, the Echo, which alone among the daily papers noticed the interesting anniversary. Bishop surely deserves the humble tribute of remembrance, if it can be said that a man who ministers purest pleasure has any claim at all upon those who benefit by his labours.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

In 1872 M. Carvalho took over the direction of the Vaudeville Theatre, in order to make an attempt at reviving Mélodrame. With this object in view, he engaged Alphonse Daudet to write a play, and Georges Bizet to prepare the incidental music. The outcome was "L'Arlesienne"—a name which has become familiar through the genius of the young composer. "L'Arlesienne" was first performed in October, 1872, four months after the production of "Djamileh." As far as the music was concerned nothing could be worse than the arrangements made for its rendering. The orchestra, all told, numbered but twenty-six instruments—two flutes, a clarinet, two bassoons, a saxophone, two horns, drums, seven violins, one viola, five celli, two double basses, and a piano (!). With these resources Bizet had to manage as best he could, and the marvel is that he succeeded in recommending his music at all. But, as most English amateurs know, the incidental pieces of "L'Arlesienne" have real merit, and their beauty could not be hidden. The numbers comprise an overture-prelude, partly constructed upon a Provençal Noël, partly upon themes used later on, an Adagietto, Intermezzo, Carillon, and various choruses. Of these only the instrumental movements exist apart from their surroundings, but they have vitality sufficient to keep the memory of the play alive even in countries such as our own—where otherwise its name would scarcely have been heard. The work was carefully put upon the stage, but ran for no more than fifteen nights, much to the disappointment of the composer, who thought he saw once more the condemnation to oblivion of some of his best music. Happily he had not long to wait for comfort in trouble. M. Pásdeloup, struck by the merit of the instrumental pieces in "L'Arlesienne," performed the Prelude, Menuet, Adagietto, and Carillon at a Concert given in the Cirque d'Hiver. There they appealed to a more cultured audience than at the Vaudeville, and the result was a great success. From that time to the present the music in question has held a place among modern works having pretensions to classic rank, and, as a Suite d'Orchestre, is likely to enjoy a long life.

Bizet's next important effort was the Overture "Patrie," composed for one of Pásdeloup's Popular Concerts, February 15, 1874. This has also been heard in England, but without receiving the favour bestowed upon the "Arlesienne" Suite. We cannot, however, pass over silently a little Suite previously written at the request of M. Edgard Colonne, who had started a series of Concerts at the transportine Odéon. These pieces are, in effect, an orchestral adaptation of five numbers taken from an earlier work for the piano entitled "Jeux d'Enfants." The movements chosen were "La Toupie," impromptu; "La Poupée," berceuse; "Trompette and Tambour," march; "Petit mari, petite femme," duet; "Le Bal," galop. These the master scored for orchestra in his most attractive manner, and announced them in Colonne's programme as "Jeux d'Enfants, petite Suite d'Orchestre." The work had a cordial reception, and still further recommended the name of its composer, who now began to see his music taken up with increasing frequency and favour. "Patrie" was played for the first time, February 15, 1874, at a Pásdeloup Concert. Its name was due to a whim of the Conductor, who refused to be content with Bizet's own description of the piece as a "dramatic overture." No doubt the change was a good stroke of business. It enlisted national feeling on the side of the music, and it suggested, in one word, what we are told was the intention of the composer. "When writing his dramatic overture," says M. Pigot, "Bizet had in view the misfortunes of the country, vanquished and delivered—the anguish of the terrible year. All the sufferings and sorrows which had sadly afflicted the patriot, strongly appealed to the imagination of the poet. He wished to sing of the mourning land so dear to the hearts of her children—the land mutilated and bleeding still; but he soon understood that sorrowful strains, the invocation of days of anguish and of tears, ill suit an era of appeasement. Then, by a poetic fiction, a happy substitution, touching as an allegory and full of lessons, he evoked the grand shade of agonised Poland, always vanquished, always rising again, the ineffaceable recollection and the sacred name of which live ever in the hearts of her scattered sons."

Following "Patrie" came "Carmen," the greatest of all our composer's works, and that which will carry his name farthest down the stream of time. This famous opera was produced on March 3, 1875, at the Opéra Comique, in presence of a crowd which included all of Paris that assumes to have any voice in the creation of public opinion. We need not stop to describe or comment on the piece. It has become the property of every amateur throughout the civilised world, and, though often presented, never wears out its welcome. More important is it to note that "Carmen" failed at the outset in winning the favour since secured so abundantly. This might have been expected, seeing that Bizet's music displayed novel features, broke loose from the classical French style, and showed a daring originality. French audiences, with all their quickness of appreciation, are intensely conservative, and "Carmen" came upon them like a shock. As the opera went on the public remained puzzled and cold. A few sympathisers ventured to applaud here and there, the quintet and the Toreador's song made a favourable impression, and the Prelude of the second Act was encored. Beyond this, approval did not go, the curtain falling upon what could be called, at best, only a success of esteem. Apropos M. Pigot observes:—

"I will not try to explain this incomprehensible behaviour of the Parisian public—the great public of 'first nights'; the artist-Paris which directs opinion and makes success. It is, indeed, inexplicable. About the fifteenth representation the work revived somewhat, but the unjust verdict of the opening evening, in great part confirmed by the press, could not be lived down. The receipts rose, but the public went to the Opéra Comique to see that which had been described as an immoral piece, so much discussed and so little admired. Thus 'Carmen' painfully reached its thirty-seven representations."

M. Pigot continues, in a strain with which we are all familiar: "To comprehend such an attitude so obviously unjust, one must assume a momentary eclipse of taste—strange, inexplicable, but real phenomenon. Musical history affords several examples of this passing craze, this cerebral default of an entire people. We recall the fate, at Vienna, in 1788, of 'Don Giovanni,' one of the greatest masterpieces of human genius. How shall we explain it, if not by the phenomenon just alluded to? Mozart, sad, discouraged, said mournfully, 'I have written

'Don Giovanni' for myself and two or three friends!'" After mentioning some Italian examples, our author adds:—"But it is in France that, above all, we have the questionable privilege of these transient errors. We turn our backs upon sincere and spontaneous admiration. . . . How many sad recollections of this I could mention, but am content to evoke the great shade of Berlioz. For Berlioz as for Bizet the hour of justice comes slowly. Neither has attained a definite triumph. Bizet is dead, and carried to the tomb the cruel uncertainty of doubt. He did not enjoy, like his predecessor, the consolation of applause heard from beyond the frontiers; he perished before "Carmen" began the triumphal progress which, at last, made us open our eyes."

With "Carmen" the French master had done his work, though he knew it not, and looked forward to other achievements. The public were cold and indifferent, but he himself must have known that the Spanish opera had in it the stuff of which great things are made. He saw himself on the road to ultimate success, and his imagination conjured up a roseate future. Encouragement to this appeared without. "Carmen" was everywhere spoken of, not always with approval, it is true, but invariably with interest. It ranked among works of the day—among things not to be ignored. Bizet noted all this, and then came the blow which struck him down. He fell with his foot on the threshold of Walhalla; at the very moment when his star was soaring upwards towards the meridian; just as victory seemed to be within his grasp. On the morning of June 3, 1875, three months after the production of "Carmen," a rumour that Bizet had died some time during the previous night spread over Paris. His friends and admirers would not credit the news. It seemed too absurd, too cruel even for a malignant fate. Nevertheless, disquiet prevailed. While protesting that the report must be false, men went about enquiringly, dreading a confirmation of the fears they laughed at. Confirmation soon came, in the shape of a telegram, addressed by Ludovic Halévy to Camille du Locle. It said: "Most horrible catastrophe! Our poor Bizet died to-night." M. Du Locle posted the fatal paper on the doors of the Opéra Comique, and the public of Paris knew that France was the poorer by a gifted man, the measure of whose possibilities had never been taken, but who had in him the promise of glory for himself and his country. Next morning the journals came out with full particulars. The master had been stricken suddenly, in his residence at Bougival, and had passed away with little suffering. According to his friend, Guiraud, Bizet had been subject to angina from his youth. The disease became periodic; generally attacking its victim in the Spring. At such times the composer would shut himself in his room, and quietly await the surcease of his pain, which, as a rule, lasted three or four days. For a few years after his marriage he was comparatively free from the unwelcome visitor, but the anxieties and hard work connected with "Carmen" caused a relapse, and in May brought about an attack of longer duration than usual. At this season of the year Bizet and his family were accustomed to leave Paris for Bougival. He insisted upon doing so now, despite his illness. "We will go at once," he said, "the air of Paris poisons me." Go he did, and the first day in the country passed off well; the invalid enjoying a walk with his wife and the pianist, Delaborde. But the following night was a horrible one. The poor master, haunted by dreadful visions, oppressed to suffocation, and in pain, could get no repose. The medical man who was hastily summoned did not, however, perceive danger. The same thing happened on the night following. They hesitated to trouble the physician a second time, but the symptoms became more urgent, and at last he was sent for. On his arrival, the patient lay calm and still. His wife believed him to be asleep. So he was, but the sleep was that which knows no waking. Midnight sounded at the moment, and in Paris they were dropping the curtain upon the thirty-third performance of the dead man's masterpiece.

The funeral rites were performed on June 5 at Trinity Church, in presence of four thousand persons. Padeloup's orchestra attended in a body and performed the "Patrie" Overture, the artists of the Opéra Comique assisted in the "Requiem," and Gounod, Thomas, Doucet, and Du Locle officiated as pall-bearers. There also were Guiraud, Massenet, Delaborde, Paladilhé, and a host of representative men, sincerely mourning the loss of one whose sun went down while it was yet day. At the close of the religious ceremonies, the honoured remains were laid to rest in the cemetery of Montmartre.

How, since then, "Carmen" has gone on from triumph to triumph, securing for Bizet a place among the world's masters, every reader knows. But this reconciles nobody to the early removal of one so well qualified to continue the line of dramatic composers, and secure for the lyric stage a new interest. Bizet's death, like the death of Mendelssohn, Schubert, Mozart, and Purcell, belongs to the mysteries of Providence, whose ways are not our ways, whose thoughts are not our thoughts.

KEY COLOUR

BY FRANZ GRÖNINGS.

We have considered key colour relative to stringed instruments, which are either bowed or pulled; one more class remains, namely, instruments in which the strings are struck by hammer-action. Of these there are two kinds, one in which the hammers are forced against the strings singly through a finger motion, the other where they are moved wholesale by rotary action. As clearly as the finger piano proves the existence of relative key colour, so clearly does the handle piano demonstrate the non-existence of key colour in the abstract as generally advocated (except the regular up and down gradation, which is always understood, as I previously explained). Remove from the former instrument the keyboard, and from the latter the barrel (or pin-plank), and the remainder is the same in both—action, soundboard, strings tuning, case, &c. Any difference in effect must therefore emanate from the removed parts, or rather from the different way in which the force is applied to or through those parts. In the former it is very uneven for various reasons, whereas in the latter it is applied with a regularity so painful that it invariably makes one laugh, and with a force so equal throughout that even Rubinstein, who may charm thousands per week, would miserably fail, if he tried to rival, in that respect, our colleagues who are sent forth from the dépôts (in Clerkenwell principally) to delight millions daily. Both ways of moving the hammers are provided, and can be applied at will separately in some of Debain's instruments. Some years ago I tried the following experiment on one of them: I took two slides and dotted a few bars of the Old Men's Chorus and of the Soldiers' Chorus from "Faust" on the one slide a semitone higher than on the other; I then performed the same things on the same instrument in four ways, namely, in two different keys per handle, and the same per finger motion—the Old Men's.

Chorus in F and in F sharp, the Soldiers' Chorus in B flat and in B natural. Par mécanique the effect was relatively the same, namely, in both pieces a little brighter in the higher key; but per keyboard it differed; the Old Men's Chorus stood out in the lower key, and the Soldiers' Chorus in the higher key. I speak here only of the relative effects of a few bars played per hammer action on the same instrument in four different ways, not with any reference to Gounod's composition; other pieces of music might have done as well for the purpose. I will now explain various causes of inequality of touch on a piano keyboard, and the reader may then find out the reasons for the above-mentioned difference for himself.

The first cause we find when we consider the construction of our hands. Mother Nature evidently never thought of fitting us out for piano-playing, else she would have provided us with fingers all alike in length, weight, strength, and independence. As it is, the thumb is comparatively a free agent, whereas the other four fingers are more or less hampered through their neighbours; and although every good player aims constantly at equalising strength and independence of all fingers, it is evident that this can only be brought to a comparative state of perfection, as other necessary daily occupations, such as handling a knife and fork, holding a pen, counting money, &c. (more or less), give the thumb always a start, as the other four fingers act jointly or as one in so many things; hence the difficulty of learning the piano for those who have hitherto been constantly handling a spade, hammer, whip, &c., which prevents the independent development of the four fingers. The thumb is also heavier in weight, and therefore in fall. The height of its fall, and consequently its accumulated force on white keys is increased, when the other finger tips are raised to the level of the black keys in some scales, instead of being on a level with the thumb as in other scales. All this must to some extent cause an unequal touch. A second cause is the difference in balancing the keyboard, and the constant alteration of leverage according to the places where the keys are touched by the fingers. The white keys are balanced about the centre of the larger piece of ivory, say about an inch from the front, and the black keys are balanced to the same weight, an equal distance down the black key; although, therefore, the balancing points of the black keys by themselves and of the white keys by themselves are in a straight line, yet these two lines are a good distance apart—namely, about the length of the broad portion of ivory on a white key. The consequences will easily be understood by making the following experiments:—Place a three-ounce weight, for instance, gently above the centre of the front portion of a white key (where the thumb strikes in the C scale) of ivory, somewhere about the middle C, and hold it suspended by a piece of twine, then let it drop; if the weight does not move the key sufficiently to make it sound, choose a key more to the right, but if it pushes the key down easily, move it to the left, till you find a note which through the simple fall of that particular weight, will just give a soft but clear sound. (The keys of a piano are more heavily balanced in the bass, and gradually less towards the treble; the balance in a grand piano of the present day varies from about four to two ounces from the lowest to the highest note.) Now suspend the same weight over the adjoining black key, say an inch down from the front of it, just touching, and then let it drop, and you will find the note struck with the same force, although the resting point on the black key is a good distance from the former position of the weight on the white key. Now lower it again to the white key, but in a line with the resting-place on the black key, just alongside of it—the white key will move, but not sound; push the weight further from you still, and the key will not even move, because the leverage is so much shortened. Alteration in leverage necessitates alteration in force; therefore the same force applied on the same key, but at different points, gives different results.

From these two causes we see that the volume of tone of the same note may alter according to the finger it is struck by, and according to the place where it is struck. Keys are necessarily struck at different points in different scales, dependent on the positions which the fingers employed at the time occupy, and the alterations in leverage must alter the relative effects. Now apply to this what I inferred when explaining the unevenness of the C scale on the violin—namely, that the balance of a scale depends on the position which the open strings occupy in the scale (whether they are the tonic, dominant, subdominant, or some of the less important degrees), and you will find no end of variety in shifting the power and producing different characteristics in sound-combinations on a piano, not only between scales themselves (whatever pitch the piano may be tuned to), but also between individual players, and even with the same player performing the same piece at different times, as it would be nothing short of a miracle if a thousand notes were struck on two occasions with the same mathematical force applied to each note at the same spot in each case. Some different colouring may be even produced by the same player in the same piece by advancing or drawing back the hands the second time.

Up to this point I have been arguing from a new piano well regulated and evenly toned. It may be necessary to explain what is meant by "toning." After the wooden hammer heads are covered with felt, the toner raises the felt by pricking slantingly into it with a set of pins: if he finds a note softer than its neighbour, he partly hardens it again with a hot iron, and so goes through the whole keyboard till he considers the quality of all notes alike. If a piano is therefore not toned to perfection, some notes will give a clearer, brighter, or harder sound than others; and this third cause may upset even relative characteristics deduced from one piano if transferred to another piano. As the piano gets older, the differences become more marked through the greater force and frequency with which the white keys are used as a rule by beginners, because through this the hammer-felt of the white keys gets sooner hardened and more worn, and they may be compared to the open strings of a violin. Relative key colour on the piano depends therefore, in a great measure, on the mixture of white and black keys, but as the open notes on piano and violin are different, the respective characteristics of the scales on those two instruments must differ also.

I speak at some length of the piano, because most people argue about key colour in general from the impressions received from a piano, although a piece they refer to may be composed for quite different sound producers, with totally different characteristics and effects; their generalisations, therefore, do not hold good. Even Schumann has fallen into this error. I cannot now discuss his article at length, but will point out one discrepancy. In his "Charakteristik der Tonarten" he says: "Play, for instance, the Sehnsuchtswaltzer in A or the Jungferchor in B, the new key will go against the grain." He evidently means "play on the piano." Well, the Sehnsuchtswaltzer is composed for piano in A flat, in which key the tonic, dominant and subdominant (exclusively employed in the bass of the second part of the trio), are black keys with short leverage, and the white keys touched mostly between the black keys at very short leverage; if played in A, tonic dominant and subdominant give a totally different framework to the building, like brick walls with wooden facings compared with wooden framework with bricked panes. But this difference is due to the uneven construction and manipulation of the piano, not to a difference in pitch. The comparative results would be the same whether played on a piano in French or in Philharmonic pitch. His second example (Maidens' Chorus from "Freischütz") is composed in C, for female voices and orchestra, not for piano. A difference in effect through transposition for this piece cannot be deducted from experiments on a piano, as the agents at work differ so much. We might as well argue about the effects of motion, that a railway train must affect us differently when moving round a sharp curve instead of in a straight line, because the jolting of a stage coach on a rough road differs from that on asphalt (even if the results in a case happened to be similar), as character, construction, and conditions of the motors are so different. The Maidens' Chorus would certainly lose in effect if performed a semitone lower, but the reasons are to be found in the organisation of the voice and the separate characteristics of the orchestral instruments employed in the accompaniment, and not because it sounds less satisfactory in transposition if played on a piano. To make this clearer still, I will refer again to the Old Men's Chorus and the Soldiers' Chorus. If this arguing from the piano held good in general, Gounod should (according to my experiments) have written the latter half a tone higher. Why did he not? Because, I think, when looking for the most suitable key, after fixing the most appropriate region in which to employ the male chorus for his motif, he reasoned as follows: "I want to employ a brass band as well on the stage, which consists principally of instruments in B flat. If I write for orchestra in B flat, the brass band will play in C, which allows them the use of the open and best notes. If I write in B natural, the cornets, &c., will have to substitute the A crook and play in D, both of which would be drawbacks in this case." In the Soldiers' Chorus relative key colour in orchestra and piano is therefore exactly the opposite, whereas in the Old Men's Chorus it would coincide. In the latter, although it might be easier to sing the falsetto a semitone higher, the accompaniment and support would be weaker in F sharp (string first, with wood-wind added afterwards); besides, that simple, yet most charming and effective phrase ever written for cornet, which precedes it, would be spoiled through change of crook and key. Such were probably the reasons which guided Gounod, and not because he found on a piano the character of the F scale more à propos than the F sharp scale. Young composers may learn from all this the advisability of not relying on effects deduced from the piano, when scoring for the concert-room or the stage; if they were not in the habit of doing so, they often would be spared the disappointment caused by the absence of effects they expect from their scoring: in this respect the piano is a cruel deceiver.

Now let me propound a few conundrums for key colour advocates in the abstract. What different impression would their nerves receive, if the middle portion in the Finale of the first act of "Rigoletto" were performed by voices and orchestra in C sharp minor (four sharps) instead of, as it is written, in D flat minor (eight flats)? What is the sum total in effect on the audience in the beginning of the Finale of the third act of "Carmen," where the chorus wants to go "away, away" in five flats, and the orchestra helps them in seven sharps? (This suggests as a sequel to the Primer on Double Counterpoint, one on double-key-colour-point.) The effect on the stage is that all people concerned remain till the end of the act.

Having now considered the principal instruments which give rise to discussions and dissensions on the vexed questions of key colour—viz., the stringet instruments, and foremost amongst these, the piano, I wish, in leaving the subject for the present, briefly to sum up the conclusions to which I have arrived. This I may best do by stating my conviction that absolute or fixed key colour does not exist, but that relative key colour exists in instruments which, through mechanism, have the use of intermediate notes between the harmonies, and that it varies with the construction and manipulation of each instrument and the combination of instruments. The absence of absolute key colour is clearly proved by simple or natural instruments which have only the harmonics.

The principal simple brass instruments are the posthorn, the bugle, the hunting horn, and the Egyptian trumpet, to which may be added the Roman lituus in G, the buccina an octave lower, and other kindred instruments. A difference in length or pitch with any of them does not seem to alter the effect on either man or beast. The sound of a coach-horn invariably quickly clears the road, and sends the horses spinning along even if it is blown in a key expressive of "calm meditation," and the quadrupeds would not move backwards to oblige any pitch or key. No more would a cavalry regiment come to a sudden standstill if the advance signal were blown on a smaller or larger bugle, and I am sure the fox enjoys the fun just as much in a "dark, mysterious, and spectral key" as in a key which expresses "pastoral life, and a certain humour and brightness," no matter which side of his mouth the huntsman blows from. Egyptian trumpets were made in A flat and B natural, but might as well be pitched otherwise. They have been frequently heard in theatres of late, since Verdi introduced them in "Aida," and as they seem to have the same effect on mankind, and answer equally well in the same pitch for either pantomime or tragic opera, composers need not bother their brains about key colour in employing them.

On the 19th ult. the treasurer of the Leeds Festival presented his balance sheet to the General Committee, and we are now able to put before our readers the financial result of a remarkable musical enterprise. The total receipts were £10,501 13s. 5d., of which £9,665 came from the sale of tickets, and £554 from that of music and programme-books. It is worth while looking at the incomings from the first-named source, because, to a certain extent, they indicate the favour in which the various works performed were held. Setting aside £5,922 as the proceeds of serial tickets, there remains £3,743 paid by purchasers of admission to single performances. Of this amount "Elijah" (for which the serial tickets were not available) drew £712. The "Golden Legend" and Part I. of "St. Paul" come next with £702, "St. Ludmila" with £620, "Israel in Egypt" with £560, and Bach's Mass in B minor with £340. So much for the morning performances. Turning to the evening Concerts, we find the "Story of Sayid" at the top of the list with £293, after it coming Stanford's "Revenge" and the "Walpurgis Night" with £263, and Schumann's "Advent Hymn," &c., with £240.

Dividing the programme into new works and standard works, it appears that the first class drew £1,878, the second class bringing in £1,861—figures which must be satisfactory to all parties, as showing no great preponderance of public favour either way. The outgoings were £7,909, the principal items being £1,801 to conductor and principal singers, £2,199 to the band, organist, librarian, &c., £1,415 to chorus and expenses connected therewith. This left a balance of £2,592, of which one fourth goes to the reserve fund (now standing at £1,800), leaving £1,950 for distribution among the medical charities. Of the attendance it suffices to say that the figures show an excess of 540 above that recorded in 1883.

AMONG the critics in attendance upon the Leeds Festival were one or two whose experience enabled them to test the chorus by the standard of the past, and who did not hesitate to point out marks of deterioration. Of course they were soundly abused for their pains, not, however, by Leeds connoisseurs, many of whom expressed their thanks for criticism which, however unpleasant, they felt to be just. At the final meeting of the Festival Committee, attention was drawn to one of the points remarked upon during the progress of the Festival, namely, the fatigue necessarily brought about by two days of heavy rehearsals immediately before the performances. It was owing to this physical weariness that the chorus fell short in "Israel," and now, we are glad to say, an opinion has been expressed in the Festival Councils against the continuance of so unwise an arrangement. The Chairman of the Executive Committee said: "Common sense told them that the chorus, band, and conductor, must be overtaxed by the enormous labours which were imposed upon them on the Monday and Tuesday of the Festival week. They must set their faces against repeating that mistake, and rather than have it maintained they should be prepared to spend a large sum of money in order to give the performers the benefit of a day's, or a day and a-half's rest before the performances." Excellent; but how much of this should we have heard had criticism been couleur de rose all over, and the truth had not been plainly spoken in our own and other columns? The best proof that the Leeds Committee are fit for their work is found in readiness to accept honest criticism in the spirit which prompts it, and to set about making good the defects it points out.

At the meeting of the Leeds Festival Committee some novel advice was tendered by Mr. A. C. Peake, who, it appears, has been exercising his mind upon the libretto of "St. Ludmila" without any satisfactory result whatever. Mr. Peake declared that the book of Dvorák's Oratorio "has no sense in it, while a great deal of it is irreverent." He will probably be surprised to hear that he stands alone in this criticism upon a work which, whatever its defects may be, is clear enough as to purport, and makes nowhere the slightest approach to irreverence. We do not, however, draw attention to Mr. Peake's remarks in order to quarrel with or controvert them. He has a right to form an opinion, however erroneous, and to give it utterance. But the worthy Committeeman went on to demand a new law guarding the Festival against bad libretti. "He suggested," says a local journal, "that the Provisional Committee at the next Festival might be given to understand that they should, if possible, see to the libretti of the works to be produced." The idea of a number of excellent gentlemen, chosen for their prominence as citizens, deliberating upon the merits of a highly technical work like a book for music is sufficiently amusing. Mr. Peake must "try again"; but we expect that he will by and by discover the necessity of taking both libretto and music upon trust—trust in the reputed good sense and skill of those who make them.

SOME anxiety is felt at Gloucester as to the probable action of the new Dean (Dr. Spence) in the matter of the Cathedral performances of sacred music. All clergymen are not of the liberal mind which distinguishes Dr. Butler, and, on the principle "Les extrêmes se touchent," very Low Church divines often agree with those at the opposite ecclesiastical pole about the use to which church buildings should be put. But, in all probability, the Gloucesterians are disquieting themselves in vain. The sacred performances have turned out to be an enormous success, both from a social and religious point of view, and the local public are almost unanimous in their favour. Wherefore, even if Dr. Spence were opposed to them—of which there is no evidence—he would hardly inaugurate his government of the Cathedral by an act certain to make him extremely unpopular among his neighbours, and sure to be unfavourably received throughout the country. By the way, if the new Dean desires to begin his reign well, let him set on foot a movement for taking down the ugly screen now shutting off the Cathedral choir from the nave, and for obtaining a new organ in place of the worn-out and inefficient instrument upon which Mr. C. L. Williams is condemned to play. This would be an improvement all round, and especially would it aid the sacred performances, in which the organ bears so great a part.

WE are glad to see that the "new use for Cathedrals" is finding acceptance in some form or other in various parts of the country, the clergy being evidently alive to the need that exists for strengthening the hold of the Church upon the masses of the people. At Norwich arrangements have been made for a sacred performance in the Choir of the Cathedral, on each of the four Wednesdays in Advent; the works chosen being the "Last Judgment" and Mozart's "Requiem." A short form of prayer will precede and follow the music, and the Dean will deliver an address on an appropriate subject. This departs somewhat from the Gloucester plan, which, of course, we do not expect to see closely followed; nor is exact imitation to be desired where local conditions favour another model. There can be no doubt that the Cathedral authorities at Norwich are doing what they consider to be their best, and we wish them all success. At the same time, we must express our regret that the performances are to take place in the Choir, and that admittance to that comparatively limited space can only be gained by written application for a ticket, and by enclosing a stamped and addressed envelope, &c. This will effectually keep out the poorer classes, who may be ready enough to enter an open door, but turn just as promptly from one that can only be approached after formality. We regret also that a collection is to be made at each performance—another effectual deterrent. There remains a hope that the forthcoming Advent performances will lead to others on a more liberal scale, and designed, not for the middle classes, so much as for the poor, whose joyless lives greatly need "sweetness and light."

By way of pointing the moral enforced in our recent leading article on performances of music in sacred buildings, we may state that a series of Organ Recitals will be given in Hampstead Parish Church during the coming winter. The opening programme is introduced to-day (December 1), by M. Guilman, who will be followed by Mr. Walter Parratt, Dr. Peace, and other eminent masters of the instrument. Adding to this the fact that Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" was recently performed in St. Marylebone Church, we have evidence that a movement towards the utilising of such edifices in the sense advocated by the Dean of Gloucester has fairly begun. The dwellers in Hampstead will doubtless show themselves appreciative of the advantage brought to their doors, but we observe that, at each Recital, a collection will be made towards defraying expenses. That is a mistake, if the poor are to be reached. Given a collection, they will stop away with one consent. Surely there is available cash enough in wealthy Hampstead to make quite needless the circulation of the plate. With reference to the Church of St. Marylebone, it is important to note that Spohr's "Last Judgment" will be performed, in connection with a special service, on each of the four Advent Thursdays. The chief feature on each occasion will be the Oratorio, regarding which it is well said, in the preliminary announcement: "The mystic language of music—the tongue of the Seraphim—the vernacular of heaven—expresses for us best what we feel in the most solemn moments of existence." The more this truth is recognised, the better it will be for art and religion.

A GREAT Russian novelist, whose treatment of music is always singularly felicitous, remarks in one of his books that to find a Russian aristocrat who can sing in tune is an impossibility. Such an imputation cannot be levelled against "le high-life" of London, even by the most rabid democrat, after such performances as those given under the bâton of Viscountess Folkestone, in the Prince's Hall, on the 18th and 19th ult. It will be remembered that nearly two years ago an outcry was raised—and by persons who ought to have known better—against amateur musicians, not because of the inferiority, but the excellence, of their performances. Our contention then was, and we see no reason to shift our ground, that instead of finding fault with this state of affairs, we ought rather to congratulate ourselves upon it. Professional artists will be stimulated into making greater efforts to vindicate their pre-eminence—if it ever is seriously assailed, which we greatly doubt—and anything which tends to raise the standard of public performance is surely to be praised rather than condemned. It is not our purpose to descend into particulars as to these Concerts, given as they were for a charitable purpose by a cast composed almost exclusively of amateurs and without any of the réclame which occasionally attends such performances. But we may speak in general terms of the efficiency of the string band of forty-seven ladies (not a wholly modern institution, as some persons seem to think, for a gentleman making the grand tour, just a hundred years ago, mentions having come across more than one such combination in Florence), the excellent singing of all the soloists, and finally the amusement caused by Mr. Scott Gatty's "Plantation" songs, genuinely humorous trifles in which the composer and his chorus gave to all whom it might concern the salutary lesson that comedy in music is not incompatible with refinement, and can be found elsewhere than on the music-hall stage. Why should not Mr. Gatty—who is thoroughly competent for such a task—set himself to answer a pressing need of the day—the absence of suitable two and three part-songs for the children of our elementary schools?

HAVING had occasion to regret the absence of papers upon music from our leading monthly reviews, it behoves us to express our satisfaction at the appearance of such an article as that by Dr. Stanford upon "The Golden Legend," which appeared in the National Review of November 1. By the very choice of this review Dr. Stanford made it plain that he regarded the production of this fine work as an event of national importance in the annals of the English school, and his generous but discriminating praise, coming as it does from a scholarly and intellectual composer, will be admitted as a remarkable tribute to the merits of the cantata. "Awaited with an impatience, which betokened good hopes, not perhaps untinted by anxiety"—so runs one passage—"it has succeeded in transcending the best wishes and anticipations of the entire musical world. It would be scarcely too much to prophesy that a place, not only amongst the permanent successes of our generation, but even in the shelves of the classics, is ready for this masterly composition of the English school. 'The Golden Legend' of Longfellow, from which the libretto is selected, has inspired our fellow countryman to write a work which, for earnestness of purpose and refinement of expression, realises all the promises held out so temptingly by his early cantatas, the 'Tempest' music, and 'Kenilworth.'" And later on we come to another remark well worth transcribing: "It restores him to his legitimate position as one of the leaders of the English school, and, inasmuch as the genuine success of his last composition will have made a return to less elevated forms of the art a matter of difficulty, if not of impossibility, the musical world may be led to hope for a series of lasting treasures from his genius. . . . His power as a creative musician and his position in the musical world alike demand his progression in the direction indicated by his latest production." Apart from the critics attached to our leading daily and weekly journals there are several prominent musicians of undeniable literary capacity, contributions from whom to the chief monthly reviews would be at least as welcome and appropriate as the papers on fox hunting, moose hunting, and salmon fishing which appear from time to time in their columns.

THE rumour that Mr. F. H. Cowen had been asked to assist Mr. Done in the work of conducting the Worcester Festival may have arisen from facts pointing to that end, but the stewards have now resolved to associate Mr. C. L. Williams of Gloucester with the veteran Worcester organist. This is a happy solution of the difficulty, because it preserves a tradition of the Three Choir Festivals upon which, we believe, almost their existence depends. All who know the state of local feeling in art matters will agree with us on this point. The Cathedral organists are the men who, during the three years' interval between Festival and Festival, keep the sacred lamp alight, and the appointment of London conductors—sometimes advocated with the best intentions by persons unacquainted with important circumstances—would be a very serious step indeed. In nominating Mr. Williams as Assistant-conductor the stewards have not only obtained an excellent man for the post, but avoided a rock ahead.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

THE Choral Society connected with this hall entered upon a new season, on the 3rd ult., with a performance of "Elijah," the soloists being Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Henschel. Simple mention of the fact is enough, inasmuch as there can be nothing to warrant criticism in the rendering of a work so well known under conditions that are frequently recurring. The least familiar feature was the Elijah of Mr. Henschel, who, it will be assumed, displayed high intelligence and dramatic spirit as a set off against a voice which does not always answer graciously to the demands upon it. Mr. Barnby conducted and the season opened successfully.

The second Concert (15th ult.) had quite a distinct interest, due to the first performance in London of Sir A. Sullivan's "Golden Legend," the composer himself conducting. Naturally, the occasion was one of great attractiveness, arising not only from the presentation of a new work by the most popular of English musicians, but also from the glowing reports which had come out of Leeds regarding the merits of the Cantata. Those reports were curiously of one mind, and, when the critics do agree, their agreement is so wonderful that the public instinctively regard the subject of it as a phenomenon. Hence there was a general desire to "assist" at the first London rendering of the "Golden Legend," and to know music which, with Orphean power, had turned the professional censors into a "happy family." The hall, under these circumstances, filled with the élite of musical London, and enthusiasm became the order of the evening.

We are not called upon to discuss Sir Arthur Sullivan's music so soon after its exhaustive treatment in connection with the Leeds Festival. Indeed, there is nothing more to be said about it, for the "Golden Legend" is not a work the beauties of which are obscure or shy, and need to be hunted patiently. It wears its heart on its sleeve for all men to see at a glance, and the acquaintance of a day should be as familiar with its character as the friend of its whole existence. This fact partially explains the instant popularity of the Cantata, as well as simplifies our present duty, which we fully discharge in pointing out that the "Golden Legend" bears re-hearing away from the excitement of a first performance, and the contagious enthusiasm of a Festival. Wherefore its beauties are real, independent of circumstances, and enduring. There is every reason to believe that the Leeds Cantata will become a standard work and help to carry its composer's name honourably down the stream of time. Turning to the performance, let due note be made of the very careful manner in which Mr. Barnby had evidently prepared the Choir to do justice to their task. The success of the choral numbers was thus assured, and great was the pleasure given to the audience by the "Evening Hymn" (encored), the delightful "O pure in heart," and the effective Epilogue. But, indeed, no fault could be found with the concerted pieces as a whole. The solos being taken by the artists responsible for them at Leeds—Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. F. King—our present duty is made light as regards them also. Enough that, in each case, the effect at the original performance was repeated, as far as that could be done under less favouring acoustical conditions, while the audience were equally ready with Yorkshire amateurs to applaud honest and able endeavour. Sir Arthur Sullivan came in for an "ovation," as a matter of course, and bore the honour with the quietness of a man who is used to it.

With the "Golden Legend" was associated Hiller's "Song of Victory"—a work of which Mr. Barnby seems fond. The solo part was sung effectively by Miss Pauline Cramer.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

THE season of these Concerts was inaugurated at St. James's Hall on October 29 by a performance of Dvorák's Leeds Oratorio, "St. Ludmila," under the conductorship of the composer, and for the first time in London. After our long analytical remarks upon this remarkable work, there can be no occasion to record our impression of its merits upon a second hearing, save to state the fact that the music grows immeasurably upon us by increased familiarity; for although there is no intricacy to unravel by a calmer dwelling upon the score than is possible during the excitement of the Festival, there are many points which become additionally interesting by repetition, and others which may be brought into prominence by an entirely fresh choir. Let us at once say that, considering the short time allowed for preparation, the exceptionally fine rendering of so difficult a composition by the excellent body of vocalists under the training of Mr. Mackenzie is deserving of all praise; for although, were we inclined to be hypercritical, it might be said that some of the leads were not promptly taken up, most of the choruses were superbly sung, some indeed—notably "The meadows mourn," "Now all gives way," and the whole of the choral portion of the third part—being given with a precision, perfect balance of tone, and dramatic effect which could not be surpassed. On the whole, we think that the cuts were made with judgment; but even were it found necessary on future occasions to omit one or two other numbers, we certainly should be glad to retain the chorus "Hear when we call." With the exception of Miss Hope Glenn, who replaced Madame Patey, the solo vocalists were the same as at Leeds. The music allotted to Svatava was thus rendered more in consonance with the composer's intention, for lying well within the range of Miss Glenn's voice, transposition, rendered imperative at Leeds, was on this occasion unnecessary. There is no need to dwell upon the exquisite manner in which the solos assigned to Madame Albani, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley were given. The air, "O grant me in the dust to fall," especially, was rendered by Madame Albani so finely as to create a perfect storm of applause, and Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Santley were no less successful in eliciting the warmest and most enthusiastic marks of approbation. There was a thoroughly efficient orchestra, led by Mr. Carodus; and the spontaneous burst of applause which greeted the composer at the conclusion of the work must have convinced him that "St. Ludmila" has still further strengthened the firm hold he had already gained over the English musical public.

There was a high function at St. James's Hall, on the 23rd ult., when musical London came together, for the second time, to hear Sullivan's "Golden Legend," and to make acquaintance with Gounod's Solemn Mass, No. 3 (De Pâques). The desire to be present on an occasion of double interest extended to many more amateurs than the Hall could accommodate, and not a few were disappointed in obtaining admittance. We are sorry for such as were sent empty away, but thankful for the evidence they gave of a wide-spread and wholesome musical curiosity—the truest symptom of artistic health. Some day, perhaps, that curiosity will extend beyond the compositions of living masters, and embrace the many works which have long been waiting due recognition. On this matter, however, more may be said when Spohr's "Calvary" comes up for hearing next February.

The Mass preceded the Cantata, and suffered, it is to be feared, from the more personal and more easily excited interest of its companion. Looking at the audience, and especially noting the large number of late arrivals, it seems clear that the man of the hour was Sullivan, and not Gounod. It would be absurd to quarrel with this, because it might have been, and doubtless was, foreseen as a natural and inevitable result. To redress the balance, the Mass should be repeated in conjunction with a standard work—a course which would gain for it the close attention it did not receive on the occasion we now notice. With regard to its music, acceptance may confidently be asked for the statement that whenever M. Gounod writes a piece for church use, he puts into it music well worthy of admiration. The deepest sympathies of the master are excited by a sacred theme, and move him to do his best. This fact appears in his latest Mass, which, though the least pretentious of its kind from the same pen, contains numerous passages conceived and wrought out in Gounod's most distinctive and impressive manner. We shall not be expected to say that there are no reminiscences of its predecessors. Repetition of himself—of course we do not mean literal repetition—is one of M. Gounod's characteristics, and belongs as much to his manner as does, say, the use of a point d'orgue. When, therefore, we here recognise traits that are familiar, we are neither surprised nor moved to censure. The work is written almost throughout in simple counterpoint, and, while not deficient in melody, depends to a considerable extent upon harmonic effects, set off by strong orchestral colour and separate instrumental themes. We need not take the trouble to state how M. Gounod handles these well-accustomed resources. He is naturally impressive, and enriches each number with the almost sensuous beauty which makes his music so welcome in the services of his church. Though the counterpoint is simple, we cannot say that the vocal parts are particularly easy. They call for a well-trained choir, but yield to patient practice, and then the whole work, by its small dimensions and readily understood character, becomes valuable in the repertory of an average choral society. Apropos, a hint may be given to conductors. When the Mass is performed as a concert-piece, the composer's indications of tempo should be somewhat strained, so as to secure variety and contrast. Only by such means is it possible to avoid a too uniform progress—less observable, of course, when the divisions of the work are separated by non-musical sections of the ritual. The Mass being wholly choral, a grave responsibility devolved upon Mr. Mackenzie's newly formed phalanx of amateurs. It was well discharged. The choir sang, generally speaking, with spirit and decision, and with due heed to expression; in all this being ably supported by a capital orchestra. Mr. Mackenzie conducted so as to give his subordinates every chance of commanding both themselves and the music.

For the "Golden Legend," Sir Arthur Sullivan took the bâton amid cordial applause, having on either hand the artists who were his interpreters at Leeds—that is to say, Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. F. King. Here our task is a limited one. We have not to discuss the music, nor need we dwell again upon the efforts of the solo vocalists. The merits of both are fixed and familiar "quantities," and our readers know all that we should tell them were loquacity to run riot. Enough that the music seemed as beautiful as ever, and the rendering of the solos as adequate as ever to its expression. The new feature was the work done by the choir, upon which we must heartily congratulate that youthful but already most efficient body. Every choral number in the Cantata had ample justice done to it, more especially the "Evening Hymn" and "O pure in heart"—both unaccompanied, and therefore a severe test. In fine, the entire performance reflected very great credit upon every one responsible for it, and must have done no little to confirm the good impressions previously made. The scenes of the Cantata were freely applauded, Sir Arthur Sullivan having several times to bow his acknowledgments, while at the close hearty demonstrations showed how much pleasure had been given and received.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

VOLKMAN's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, in A minor, which Herr Julius Klengel introduced on the occasion of his first appearance before an English audience, on October 30, is a work marked by constructive cleverness rather than melodic invention. Still it served to demonstrate the soloist's thorough command of the resources of his instrument. In an air by Bach he showed himself to be possessed of genuine feeling and refinement of style, while in two elegant trifles of his own composition he made it clear that technical difficulties are unknown to him. In fine, Herr Klengel is a finished artist, whose future appearances in this country will be awaited with legitimate interest. His tone is not always very agreeable, but his skill and intelligence are of the highest order. "Tannhäuser's Pilgrimage" (the introduction to the third act of "Tannhäuser"), now performed for the first time at these Concerts, received a fine interpretation at the hands of the orchestra, a remark which applies with equal accuracy to the renderings of Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture, and that of Berlioz on "Waverley." In connection with the latter, we cannot refrain from quoting a sentence out of Schumann's admirable criticism on this Overture, appropriately included in the programme book: "It is hard to say whether he (Berlioz) should be regarded as a genius or a musical adventurer; he dazzles like a flash of lightning, but leaves a smell of brimstone behind; at one time bringing before us grand propositions and truths, at another sinking into schoolboy stammerings." The Symphony was the "Scotch," splendidly played; and the vocalist, Mlle. Ella Russell, who was deservedly applauded for her rendering of "Deh vieni non tardar" ("Nozze di Figaro"). Later on she gave, with considerable brilliancy, the familiar "Scena e rondo finale" from the "Sonnambula," "Ah! non credea" and "Ah! non giunge," introducing a cadenza winding up with an F in alt, and, injudiciously yielding to the plaudits which such feats invariably evoke, even at the Crystal Palace, repeated the painful ascent to the apparent satisfaction of the majority of those present.

Of the performance of Dvorák's "St. Ludmila," on the 6th ult., little need be said, and that little in unqualified commendation. The only change in the cast from that which had taken part at the performance in St. James's Hall consisted in the substitution of Miss Annie Marriott for Madame Albani. Miss Marriott is an exceedingly conscientious and intelligent artist, and her efforts met with the recognition they deserved. The choir showed a decided improvement in the confidence and precision with which they attacked the difficulties of the score, while the other principals acquitted themselves of their shares in the work in their usual finished style. It is worth noticing that by dispensing with an interval the time occupied in the performance of the work, with the "cuts" now recognised, was reduced to about two hours and twenty minutes.

A novelty of first-rate importance, in the shape of Gade's Violin Concerto in D, was the chief feature of the fifth Concert. This work, which was chosen by Mr. John Dunn, a young English violinist of considerable promise, for his début before a Sydenham audience, thoroughly deserves the description given of it in the programme as "a beautiful and important addition to a section of musical literature that is not at all too full." If it be wanting in the fantastic forms which are usually associated with Scandinavian music, it has the more abiding charm of a tranquil and serene beauty. The Finale again is full of picturesque animation. Such being the character of this work, it was from no want of technical skill, but from an absence of repose in style that Mr. Dunn failed to do justice to its manifold beauties. He has vigour and purity of tone, particularly in the upper register of his instrument, but his emphasis is exaggerated and he is quite too fond of bringing his bow down martellato fashion wherever a sforzando is marked. This abruptness seriously detracts from his merits as a performer, especially in so essentially poetic a composition as Gade's Concerto. Mr. Dunn was also heard in Ernst's Fantasia on themes from Rossini's "Otello," a show piece which, in spite of its technical difficulties, is a far less effective criterion of a player's capacity than the Concerto. Mr. Cowen's clever "Exhibition" Overture in D, and the concert arrangement of the Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," were both heard for the first time at these Concerts, the performance of the latter proving the finest of the afternoon, not even excepting that of Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony (No. 3, in E flat). The announcement that Mr. Sims Reeves was to sing was no doubt responsible for the good attendance, nor were the expectations of his many admirers disappointed. Mr. Sims Reeves, who was in good voice, gave "Waft her, angels," and "The Message."

On Saturday, the 20th ult., Berlioz's sacred Trilogy, "The Childhood of Christ," was performed, for the first time at these Concerts, with Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Henry Piercy, Mr. Hilton, and Mr. Santley as principals. An efficient interpretation of this interesting work was given, though the minute instructions of the composer cannot be said to have been always carried out. The chorus, although singing steadily and correctly throughout, never realised the treble, and even quadruple, pianos indicated in the score. Again, the accompaniment to the choir of unseen angels is not assigned to the organ, but to the "physharmonica," and might easily have been furnished by a harmonium behind the scenes. But with all deductions the performance was highly satisfactory. Miss Mary Davies, who is seldom heard in Oratorio, has here a part excellently adapted to her refined style and sympathetic voice. Mr. Santley gave the music assigned to Joseph with great feeling; Mr. Piercy was thoroughly efficient as the Narrator, and Mr. Hilton, as King Herod and the father of the Ishmaelite family, and Mr. Stanley Smith as Polydorus, lent useful aid. On the whole, the impression left by this work is that Berlioz, naturally inclined towards the grandiose, has hardly succeeded in his efforts after naïve simplicity. The incantation music reminds one of Wagner's happy description of its author, as "verflucht piffing," but how incongruous is the musical setting of much of the third part, how out of keeping with the homely surroundings that we have always learnt to attach to the characters concerned! And, in conclusion, how gullible Berlioz's friends must have been if they could imagine that a writer in 1679 could have composed music so essentially modern as that which he attributed to the imaginary Pierre Ducré

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

As usual the opening of the twenty-ninth season of these valued entertainments was marked by the utmost quiet and absence of ostentation. There is no ground for surprise that Mr. Arthur Chappell thinks it unnecessary to lead off with a flourish of trumpets; he is not in the position of a struggling caterer who has to strain every nerve to win public favour. He knows that whenever he chooses he can fill St. James's Hall from end to end, and hence an easy confidence marks the conduct of his undertaking. This was betokened in the programme of the first Concert, on the 1st ult., as although it could not be considered as in any way unworthy, it did not contain any items which experience proves to be specially attractive. The first piece was Mozart's Divertimento in B flat, for strings and horns, one of eighteen such works, only four of which have yet been introduced at the Popular Concerts. The Mozart répertoire of chamber music is in itself almost inexhaustible. How admirable was the performance of the B flat Divertimento (No. 287 in Köchel's Catalogue) may be surmised when we say that the string parts were played by Madame Norman-Néruda, and Messrs. Ries, Holländer, and Piatti; Messrs. Naldrett and Keevil taking those for horns. In spite of Schumann's opinion we do not regard Mendelssohn's early Capriccio in F sharp minor (Op. 5) as a very interesting piece, though it served to display the fine manipulation of Miss Fanny Davies; and, as usual, the audience insisted upon encoring the fair artist. She subsequently joined Signor Piatti in Rubinstein's beautiful Sonata in D, for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 18), and two violin solos, by Raff, exquisitely played by Madame Néruda, completed the instrumental portion of the Concert. Mr. Santley may be commended for introducing Purcell's splendid aria, "Let the dreadful engines," which of itself proves how greatly music in England suffered by the composer's untimely death.

A very attractive programme drew a full audience at the first of the Saturday performances, on the 6th ult. Mozart's Quintet in D may not be quite so popular as the companion work in G minor, and the same may be said of Schumann's Quartet in E flat (Op. 47), as compared with the Quintet in the same key; but both are justly favourite works. The performance of Beethoven's Sonata in E (Op. 109), by Miss Fanny Davies, showed how rapidly this young executant is advancing in her art. It was an ideal rendering, full of thought, colour, and poetic feeling. Signor Piatti's recently composed Sonata in D, for pianoforte and violoncello, was presented for the first time to a Saturday audience, and was well received. Mr. Henschel, who is always eclectic in his vocal selections, introduced a striking ballad, "Die verfallene Mühle," by Loewe, and Schumann's popular "Die beiden Grenadiere."

The pièce de résistance on the following Monday was Beethoven's Rasoumowski Quartet in F (Op. 59, No. 1), which only yields in popularity to No. 3 of the same series. It would be as absurd to write criticism of this as of the other concerted works in the programme, Mozart's Duet in G, for violin and viola, and Haydn's Pianoforte Trio in C. On this occasion Miss Fanny Davies contented herself with two numbers of Schumann's Phantasistücke (Op. 12), and a third by way of encore. Madame Valleria appeared not only as a vocalist, but afforded evidence of her literary capacity by putting forward a very tasteful and elegant translation of Mendelssohn's Swedish Winter Song, her rendering of which was warmly encored.

The programme of Saturday, the 13th, was more noteworthy, as all the items were more or less unfamiliar, not one of them having been previously heard more than half-a-dozen times. Dvořák's Quartet in E flat (Op. 51) is a work thoroughly characteristic of the Bohemian composer; though it is possible to object to its extreme length it cannot be said that it ever becomes dull. The first and last movements are exceedingly fine, and the national colouring in the "Dumka" or Elegy is very effective. It is a pity that the Romance which follows this should suffer by the want of contrast. A work of this length needs a movement of the Scherzo type in order to prevent a sense of monotony. Madame Frickenhaus introduced, for the first time, Chopin's Scherzo in C sharp minor, of which she gave an exceedingly good rendering. Herr Straus, the leader on this occasion, brought forward, also for the first time, three Violinstücke by Ferdinand Hiller (Op. 87), very difficult but effective pieces. Brahms's splendid Quintet in F minor (Op. 34) concluded an interesting Concert, to which Mr. Lloyd contributed songs by Schubert and Mendelssohn.

The potent counter-attraction of "The Golden Legend" at the Albert Hall, on the 15th, had, no doubt, some effect in thinning the attendance, and the programme was quiet and unexciting. Not a word need be said concerning Mendelssohn's Quartet in D (Op. 44, No. 1) nor Beethoven's early Sonata for piano and violin, in E flat (Op. 12, No. 3). Madame Frickenhaus played three out of five movements of a Pianoforte Suite in G, by Grieg (Op. 40). The work is described by the composer as "aus Holberg's Zeit," and he adds in a note—"Ludwig Holberg (1684—1754), the Molière of the northern nations, is the creator of the new Danish-Norwegian literature." Grieg has, therefore, designedly imitated the Handel-Bach style, as exemplified in their Suites. On another occasion Madame Frickenhaus may well give the work in its complete form. Miss Hope Glenn may be complimented on her unhackneyed vocal selections.

St. James's Hall was crowded to its last seat on the 20th ult., but whether the special attraction was Beethoven's Quartet in F (Op. 59), which was repeated "by desire," or Dr. Villiers Stanford's Sonata in A, for piano and violoncello (Op. 9), cannot be said. The latter was given for the first time, but it is not a new work, as indeed may be gathered from its early Opus number, and it is said to have been performed at one of Mr. Franke's Concerts in 1882. To most, if not to all, of Mr. Chappell's audience it must, of course, have been an absolute novelty, and the impression it created was extremely favourable. The Sonata is in three movements, of which the second—which may be taken as a kind of quiet Scherzo—is the most pleasing, though the others are written with equal refinement and elegance of style. The composer was, indeed, fortunate in his interpreters—Miss Fanny Davies and Signor Piatti—and it is impossible that his work can ever be heard under more favourable conditions. The rest of the programme does not call for comment.

The largest Monday audience of the season as yet was drawn together on the 22nd ult., by the announcement that Schubert's Octet would be performed in its entirety. Time was when the fourth and fifth movements of this immense work had perforce to be omitted, as the parts were not obtainable; but even later these portions have been left out on the grounds that the performers would certainly, and the audience might be, fatigued. Such a course is not to be lightly condemned, but the plan adopted on the present occasion is far better, and it will probably be repeated in future. The customary interval took place after the third movement, so that players and listeners were better prepared for the rest of the work. If we do not dwell on the beauties of this marvellous effort of genius, it is because the ordinary terms of eulogy and admiration are not applicable. The Octet is the very essence and concentration of melody, theme after theme of surpassing loveliness is presented, until the mind becomes almost surfeited with sweetness. We say almost advisedly, because the audience showed no sign whatever of weariness, but, on the contrary, applauded the closing movements with increased warmth. Perhaps it will be well to give the names of those who contributed to a memorable performance. The quintet of strings was composed of Madame Néruda, and Messrs. Ries, Straus, Reynolds, and Piatti, and the clarinet, bassoon, and horn parts were taken respectively by Messrs. Lazarus, Wotton, and Paersch. Mozart's Piano-Trio in G, No. 8, commenced, and two pieces by Chopin, played by Miss Fanny Davies, concluded the Concert. The piquant rendering of two of Massenet's songs by Miss Liza Lehmann must not pass unmentioned.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

LOVERS of opera are not disposed to be very critical when a manager comes forward with that species of entertainment in London; since our metropolis, as regards serious lyric drama, is a "waste, howling wilderness." They ought to be, and are, thankful for small mercies—even for the representations offered by Mr. Mayer at Her Majesty's Theatre during much of the past month. It must be said, however, that their gratitude has to contend against a strong feeling of dissatisfaction, not unmixed with wonder as to what sort of conception the entrepreneur has formed in regard of English taste. Mr. Mayer's company is truly a mixed lot, drawn from almost every prominent stage in Paris, and comprising a number of artists whose reputé belongs rather to the past than the present. We are not disposed, however, to quarrel with the manager regarding his leading people. It is distinctly worth anybody's while to see and hear Madame Fides-Devries, M. Vergnet, M. Dauphin, and M. Devries in "Faust"; to witness the efforts of Madame Galli-Marie and M. Duchesne in "Carmen"; to enjoy the bright performance of Madame Girard and M. Simon Max in "Les Cloches de Corneville," and to revive old sensations by witnessing Madame Mary Albert and M. Dauphin in "La Grande Duchesse." In several cases the artists above-named "created" their respective parts years ago, and their present efforts, however lacking in the old fire and completeness, have therefore an interest which is historical. But it is hard to approve the odd mixture of stages and styles whereby Mr. Mayer seeks to please everybody. "Faust" and "La Grande Duchesse"! "Rigoletto" and "Les Cloches de Corneville"!—this is going "from grave to gay, from lively to severe" with a vengeance, and, we fear, has produced on the public mind the impression inseparable from treating art in a flippant or cynical spirit. Apparently, there is no question of art in the existing councils of Her Majesty's Theatre. That being so, "Faust," "Rigoletto," and "Carmen" certainly have no business there, whatever may be said of works by Offenbach and his congeners.

With the strongest wish to be courteous in our remarks upon the French company, it is hard to observe politeness when speaking of the ensemble. A more ineffective chorus and orchestra than Mr. Mayer's could scarcely have been got together had the manager desired to frighten amateurs away from his premises. The band, no doubt, contains some decent players, but, eliminating these, we have left what might stand for the sweepings of French theatres—a truly "scratch" lot, with hardly a redeeming feature. These are plain, and seemingly harsh, words, but they do no more than meet the justice of the case, and we feel imperatively called upon to protest against the infliction upon us, in one of our historic houses, and in connection with eminent names, of representations which, taken as a whole, are calculated to injure public taste. Let us hope that before the enterprise comes to an end the standard of merit will have been raised.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

UNDER this title, Mr. George Henschel gave the first of a series of orchestral performances in St. James's Hall, on the 17th ult. Our readers scarcely require to be told that Mr. Henschel left Europe several years ago for the purpose of conducting a similar enterprise established in Boston, U.S., by a spirited citizen of that far from mean city. The German musician met with considerable success during his three years' tenancy of the post; proving not only competency with the bâton, but wide knowledge and eclectic taste. On his return to this country, he evidently brought with him a lively appreciation of the office which circumstances had induced him to resign, and a desire to renew in London the successes achieved across the water. To this end he set to work with characteristic energy; soon managing to obtain a guarantee fund large enough for security against loss during, at any rate, two seasons. The rest was plain sailing, and, having engaged a first-rate orchestra of eighty instruments, Mr. Henschel put himself and his venture before the public as already stated. Amateurs are ready with sympathy for this kind of thing; asking no questions when once it appears that the purpose is really artistic. Mr. Henschel may, therefore, depend upon the favourable attitude of those whom he seeks to attract; all the more because he runs against no existing interest; so timing his Concerts as that they shall fill a blank in our musical year. Usually there have been no orchestral performances in London proper between the Richter autumn season and the opening of the Philharmonic Society's doors. It is precisely this interval which Mr. Henschel proposes to fill by giving weekly Concerts from the middle of November till March. We have, therefore, a double reason for desiring his success.

The first performance was well attended and passed off in an encouraging manner, with no lack of expressed goodwill on the part of the audience, or of provocation to applause on the part of Conductor and orchestra. The programme had been selected with obvious care. It comprised the Overture to "Die Zauberflöte," Beethoven's Triple Concerto for piano, violin, and violoncello (played by Madame Haas, Mr. Gompertz, and Mr. Piatti); Brahms's Symphony in D (No. 2), the Good Friday music from Wagner's "Parsifal," and the Feast Prelude from Mackenzie's "Troubadour." These works having passed beyond the stage of criticism, our business lies entirely with their performance, which, generally speaking, deserved all the approval bestowed by the audience. We do not say that it was microscopically perfect, nor could that result have been expected at a first Concert by the most sanguine. There were times, for example, when the elaborate details of the Symphony did not appear with adequate clearness. But the reading of all the works showed a comprehensive grasp, and the high intelligence of a trained and exceptionally qualified musician. This was the main point for demonstration, and now amateurs can wait with confidence for weekly opportunities of gratifying and, at the same time, improving their taste. Mr. Charles Kaiser, a young German tenor, was the only vocalist. He seemed ill at ease, and nervousness may have prevented him from controlling his voice with customary skill. At any rate, we shall assume this till another opportunity of hearing him presents itself.

The second Concert, which took place on the 25th ult., was less well attended than the first, but showed an advance in every other respect. More of interest marked the programme, for example; mainly through the presence in it of a novelty—an Orchestral Idyl, entitled "Evening by the Seashore," the work of Mr. F. Corder. This piece, apparently written some years ago, aims at being a tone-picture, not through realistic qualities, but by those which embody suggestions of feeling. It is appropriately quiet, meditative, and poetical, while not lacking in contrast or even in vigorous expression. Mr. Corder here makes an experiment in 5-4 measure, and succeeds fairly well. The most attractive part of the work is distinguished by a solo for the French horn without valves. In this case a soft and dreamy tranquility entirely accords with the nature of the scene depicted. Other things in the programme were the Overture to "Athalie," Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto (very finely played by Miss Fanny Davies), Beethoven's fourth Symphony, and a selection from the Ballet music in Saint-Saëns's "Henry VIII." All the orchestral performance was capital. Indeed, it is long since we heard a neater, more finished, and more enjoyable rendering of the Symphony, which delighted a critical audience from first to last. So with the Concerto, at the close of which the pianist was several times recalled, and that deservedly, for a display of the highest qualities. Miss Pauline Cramer sang two songs by Grieg, and altogether the Concert gave much satisfaction, being an earnest, let us hope, of complete success for the series.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

OF the three performances constituting the autumn series of these Concerts, the first has already been noticed. The remaining two were given on Saturday, October 30, and Tuesday, the 9th ult., but, no more than their predecessor, excited a special interest, the manager being satisfied to draw again, and yet again, upon a limited repertory. We have several times pointed out the unwisdom of such restricted operations, and events are proving that we did not so act without reason. The Richter Concerts have rapidly declined in public favour, because even the most enthusiastic votaries of Wagner and Liszt cannot always subsist upon the pabulum furnished by those composers; nor can admirers of classical music find all they need in Beethoven's Symphonies. So far as these Concerts have been carried on to further the aims of a particular school, they are now at the end of their tether, and it is to be hoped that their new proprietors will give them a larger mission, so regulating the programmes that at least some sense of proportionate value, as between composer and composer, may be observed.

The second Concert, which was fairly attended, presented the following works:—Beethoven's Overture "Coriolan"; Wagner's Good Friday Music ("Parsifal"); Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," orchestrated by Berlioz; Liszt's Fourth Hungarian Rhapsody, and Brahms's Symphony in E minor (No. 4), this last standing in place of the usual Symphony by Beethoven. With the exception of Brahms's work, all these have been made familiar, and there is nothing more to be said about them, unless we express surprise that Berlioz's transcription of Weber found its way into such a programme. A transcription should always be looked at askance per se. It is generally impertinent, when intended for public use, and in this case we fail to see how anybody or anything benefits by departing from the composer's design. The latest Symphony of the greatest living German master had, of course, an attentive and respectful hearing, but seemed to make little way with the audience, who noted chiefly its excessive elaboration and want of spontaneity. We shall not travel again over the ground we traversed when the work was first performed amongst us. There may come a time when the Symphony will speak in language at once simple, intelligible, and beautiful, but neither connoisseurs nor amateurs appear to be educated up to the point of perception just now. The Symphony, like everything else in the programme, was finely rendered, and spoke with every advantage of interpretation. In the course of the evening Mrs. Hutchinson sang Berlioz's "Absence," from "Les Nuits d'Été."

The third Concert took place on Lord Mayor's Day, when dread of mobs and rioting effectually operated to keep music-lovers away. Only a small number braved the troubles of the streets to hear the "Tannhäuser" Overture, Brahms's Rhapsody for alto solo (Miss Lena Little) and male chorus; a selection from "Der Ring des Nibelungen," and the Choral Symphony once more played under Mr. Richter's direction.

MDLLE. KLEEBERG'S PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

It has fallen to the lot of Mdle. Clotilde Kleeberg to commence the season of Pianoforte Recitals, and it was unfortunate for the esteemed young artist that her first performance fell on one of those days when people either on business or pleasure bent were greatly impeded in their movements by fog. Still, the audience in the Prince's Hall on the 24th ult. was not despicable in point of numbers, and the programme was thoroughly appreciated, judging by the hearty applause. It consisted for the most part of important works, such as Bach's Fifth Suite Française, Beethoven's rarely heard Sonata in B flat (Op. 22), Schumann's Kreisleriana, and Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses. Such a selection is far more interesting than one composed of odds and ends if the executant is capable of doing it justice, and Mdle. Kleeberg's playing must have satisfied the most fastidious listener. The Suite was rendered with perfect technique, the Sonata with charming taste and expression, and the Variations with considerable power. A better all round performance could not have been desired, and the claims of the pianist to rank among the highest in her profession can no longer be disputed.

MR. DANNREUTHER'S CONCERTS.

ALTHOUGH these pleasant musical evenings can scarcely be placed among public enterprises of importance, they are always sufficiently interesting to call for some record, Mr. Dannreuther making it a point to introduce several new works by English and foreign composers in every series. Thus at the first of the seventeenth series on the 4th ult., the programme included a new Quintet in D for piano and strings, by Dr. Villiers Stanford. The work was appreciated at once owing to the clearness of its construction, the composer having wisely avoided the laboured, involved style of utterance which may appear profound, though it is often adopted merely to conceal the writer's poverty of invention. The new Quintet is perfectly lucid and decidedly pleasing, if not strikingly original. At a first hearing we preferred the Adagio and Finale to the first movement and the Scherzo, which is by no means a bad sign, as it proves that the music is not wearisome. We shall hope to hear Dr. Stanford's work at St. James's Hall on some future occasion. The only other concerted composition was Brahms's masterly Pianoforte Quintet in F minor (Op. 34), but Miss Lena Little's vocal selections were interesting. They included two of Liszt's most characteristic songs, "Lasst mich ruhen" and "Die drei Zigeuner," and an extremely picturesque and expressive "Poème d'Octobre," by Massenet.

The second Concert, on the 18th ult., may be briefly dismissed, as it did not include any actual new works. Dr. Hubert Parry's Pianoforte Quartet in A flat has been heard at the Popular Concerts, but it did not create a very favourable impression, and cannot be numbered among the best things the composer has done. Beethoven's Trio in D (Op. 70, No. 1) and Brahms's Sonata in G for piano and violin (Op. 78) were the other leading items in the programme.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

AN excellent Chamber Concert was given by the students of this Institution, at St. James's Hall, on the 19th ult. The programme was in the highest degree interesting, all the compositions of the pupils showing not only the result of diligent study and sound teaching, but evidencing the possession of creative power which can scarcely fail to ripen in the future. Of the instrumental works we may speak in the warmest terms of praise, an "Allegro," from a string Quartet in C, by Arthur Godfrey (played by Miss Winifred Robinson, Mr. Edward O'Brien, Miss Cecilia Gates, and Mr. C. H. Allen Gill), and a Sonata in E flat for violin and pianoforte, by C. S. Macpherson (performed by Mr. Lewis Hann and the composer), containing both attractive material and highly finished workmanship. A Suite for the pianoforte, composed and performed by Miss Dora Bright, created a marked impression, both from the attractiveness of the music and the charmingly refined manner in which it was rendered; and commendation must also be awarded to Miss Amelia Cooper, who played two of her own pianoforte Studies with much success. Two clever songs by Rose Meyer were well sung by Miss Blanche Murray, and Miss Julia Neilson gave an intelligent reading of a well written song by Theo. Ward. The exceptionally clever violin playing of Master Walenn, in Moszkowski's Ballade in G (in which the pianoforte part was taken by Mr. Albert H. Fox), the performance of Mozart's Sonata in D for two pianofortes, by Miss Alice Cooper and Miss Maude Wilson, and the artistic rendering of Bach's Organ Fantasia and Fugue in G minor on the pianoforte (Liszt's arrangement), by Mr. Ernest Fowles, must be selected for especial praise from amongst a number of items all of which were most creditable both to the young students and their teachers. The singing of the choir was generally excellent, but the effect created by Benet's Madrigal, "Flow, O my tears," was so great that Mr. Barnby (whose conducting of the Concert was the theme of admiration throughout the room) was compelled to come forward and bow his acknowledgments.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

THE music performed at the thirty-eighth College Concert, held on October 28, was marked by the usual judicious catholicity of taste shown in the selection of these programmes, ranging from Mozart to Gounod and Beethoven to Grieg. A Suite for pianoforte by the last-named writer—one of his most recent compositions—was introduced by Miss Jenkins, but, in spite of a conscientious rendering, failed to impress the audience, first impressions in this case, we venture to say, being likely to prove correct. The work is singularly deficient in the characteristic colouring of this usually attractive writer. Of the concerted music given, the first place is claimed by Schumann's Trio in G minor for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, with Miss M. Moore, Mr. Inwards, and Mr. Squire in charge of the respective instruments—an ultra-Schumannesque composition, and for that reason incapable of receiving a perfectly adequate interpretation at the hands of such youthful performers. In Beethoven's Duet for piano and violin in E flat (Op. 21, No. 3), Miss Hallett, a very promising young pianist, and Mr. Sharman were heard to considerable advantage, and Mr. Sutcliffe played a Solostück for violin, by Kiel (Op. 70, No. 1), in masterly fashion, spite of an occasional failure of memory. When Mr. Sutcliffe adds warmth to his many other good qualities he will no longer merely interest, but delight his hearers. Passing to the vocal selections, we may briefly mention that Mr. Houghton showed himself to be possessed of a useful, but at present unequal, tenor, by his singing of Mozart's "Dalla sua pace"; that the Quintet "Scrivermi" (Così fan tutte) was encored—an exception being made in favour of the brevity of the piece and the humour of one of the bassi—and that Miss Julie Albu displayed a soprano of a bright, but rather hard, timbre in "Angels ever bright and fair."

The second Concert of the term, held on the 11th ult., was chiefly memorable for the exceptionally good performance, by Miss Kellett and Mr. Squire, of Beethoven's Sonata for piano and violoncello (Op. 69). Miss Kellett's phrasing was marked by an enhanced finish; indeed, at each successive appearance she displays a greater breadth of style and intelligence, qualities which, in conjunction with a round and sympathetic touch, inspire her hearers with the highest hopes for her future. Mr. Squire, too, showed a notable advance on his previous efforts in his share of the work. Another welcome item in the programme was Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat, played with great freedom and certainty by Misses Macdonald and Donkersley, Messrs. Kreuz and Blagrove. Pianoforte solo music was represented by an Introduction and Toccata, by Rheinberger, Liszt's arrangement of Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, and Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, which met with competent renderings from Mr. Rickett, Miss Sharman, and Miss Marian Osborn respectively, the last-named being especially successful. Several vocal numbers were also included in the programme, the Quartet from the "Magic Flute," "Behold, the golden sun," being very heartily received, while a pleasing impression was created by a MS. Duet, "A Serenade in canon," of a tuneful and unaffected character, rendered by Misses Krüger and Risch, and written by Miss C. Carr Moseley.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE excellent work accomplished by this Society during the past ten years, of which a record is given in the prospectus of the present season, has often received favourable comment from us. But it is not often given, even to an Association concerning itself with the performance of novelties and neglected masterpieces, to accomplish such a task as that which rendered the Concert of the 1st ult. of absorbing interest. That a work written by Mozart should be lost for more than a century, then brought to light and performed for the first time in a concert-room at the East end of London, constitutes a curious chapter in musical history. In 1778 the great composer was struggling vainly to gain a footing in Paris. Among the works specially composed for the French capital was a "Sinfonie Concertante," for oboe and clarinet (not flute, as stated by Jahn), bassoon and horn. Concerning this Mozart writes to his father on May 1 as follows: "There is another 'hick-hack!' with the Sinfonie Concertante. I believe there is something behind, for I have my enemies here, as where have I not had them? It is a good sign, however. I was obliged to write the Symphony in great haste, worked hard at it, and thoroughly satisfied the four performers. Le Gros had it four days for copying, and I always found it lying in the same place. At last, the day before the Concert, I did not find it; searched about among the music, and found it hidden away. I could do nothing but ask Le Gros, 'Apropos, have you given the Sinfonie Concertante to be copied?' 'No, I forgot it.' Of course I could not order him to have it copied and played, so said nothing. The day it should have been performed I went to the Concert; Ramm and Punto came up to me in a rage, and asked why my Sinfonie Concertante was not played. 'I do not know; this is the first I have heard of it.'" Jahn adds in a foot-note that the work is lost beyond recovery, Mozart having kept no copy. But in this he was in error, as he subsequently obtained one, and it was found in his collection after his death, and was published last year in the "Supplement to the Complete Edition of Mozart's Works." No one who heard the work in the Shoreditch Town Hall, on the 1st ult., could for an instant doubt its authorship. It is pure Mozart from beginning to end, and the third movement, a set of variations, is worthy to compare with the best things of the kind by the same composer. The performance, with Messrs. Malsch, Beddome, Wotton, and Mann as the soloists, was absolutely without flaw. We have left ourselves no space to speak in detail of the rendering of Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride." Enough that it proved the very high state of efficiency now attained by Mr. Prout's choir, and that justice was rendered, on the whole, to the solos by Madame Eleanor Farnol, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Bridson, the last-named artist making a great effect in the part of the Narrator. A fine performance of Mendelssohn's "Loreley" Finale concluded the Concert.

THE SHELLEY SOCIETY.

It is often our unpleasant duty to take note of cases where mischief is wrought by the exercise of zeal untempered by discretion; but an instance so flagrant as the Shelley Society's performance at St. James's Hall, on the 16th ult., is happily rare. One branch of the labours of this literary body would seem to be the performance of Shelley's dramas, which being no more suitable for the stage than are those of Byron would, under ordinary circumstances, never be brought to a hearing. With regard to "Hellas," the poet declares that it is a mere flight of fancy, the outcome of sympathy with the Greek people in their struggle for independence. It contains some of his most inspired lines, and the choruses, which form a large proportion of the poem, invite musical treatment of a lofty character. We have, happily, composers who would be able to set them in a manner worthy of the theme, and of the dignity of their own art. The Committee of the Shelley Society, however, seem to have been of opinion that any one with a knowledge of the grammar of music could sit down and write a score on any given subject, much as a theatrical conductor is expected to provide accompaniments to the thrilling situations in a melodrama. We are apt to plume ourselves on the spread of musical culture in non-professional circles, but it appears that a body of highly educated persons can still exhibit such lamentable ignorance of the special gifts and learning required for the task they entrusted to Dr. W. C. Selle. There is no occasion to deal harshly with this unfortunate composer, who is now, probably, heartily sorry for his own presumption; the chief blame is due to the Society which placed him in a terribly false position. A mere glance at the vocal score of his work, shows it to be not only unworthy to be associated with "Hellas," but far below what one expects to find in simple Cantatas for elementary classes or schools. To employ the ordinary terms of criticism to such sorry stuff would be ridiculous, and in fact a mere waste of words. Feeble, however, as the music is on paper, it conveys no idea of the effect in performance on the above occasion. Errors of every kind appeared to abound in the vocal and instrumental parts, and the Conductor and his forces were frequently at variance. St. James's Hall has seldom if ever resounded to such discordant noise. It is unnecessary to dwell here upon the wearisome recitation of the dialogue by "a competent elocutionist," or the hopeless confusion between the recited and the lyrical portions of the work. Enough, that if the intention had been to throw ridicule on an effort of genius, it could not have been more successfully carried out.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE sketch programme of the usual Hallé series of Concerts has now not only been made public, but has been put into practical shape by the two performances which have already taken place.

The opening Concert was given at the Philharmonic Hall, on the 2nd ult., and the items selected for performance were unimpeachable. First and foremost in point of classical importance was Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, and its rendering by the orchestra was beyond all criticism, evidencing that the quality of Mr. Hallé's organisation of too instrumentalists has not been affected in the interim since last season. Cherubini's "Anacreon" Overture also figured in the programme. The memory of Liszt was put on record by a faithful performance of "Les Préludes," from the "Poème Symphonique," although its brazen, glittering character was scarcely in keeping with an "In Memoriam" performance. Mr. Hallé contributed in faultless style two items arranged by Liszt from Wagner's "Spinnerlied" ("Flying Dutchman"), and No. 8, "Rhapsodie Hongroise." The special engagement of Madame Albani attracted an audience which, in addition to the regular subscribers, completely filled the hall, and they were well rewarded. Madame Albani's selections were the prayer from "Der Freischütz," "Piano, Piano"; Elsa's air in the Balcony scene from "Lohengrin"; and the Valse from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet."

The second Hallé Concert took place on the 16th ult., and furnished a varied programme, with perhaps special prominence to two worthy English composers, Purcell and Sterndale Bennett. They were, however, merely laid under contribution for interesting vocal selections, if we except Bennett's Overture "The Naiades," which is not only most enjoyable, but so scholarly as to defy the cavil of the purist. The Symphony was Haydn's No. 30, in A major, and its free and crisp rendering set off its graceful proportions to full advantage. The limited number of wind instruments generally required in Haydn's orchestration is often, as in this case, refreshing. Madame Norman-Néruda made her first appearance at these Concerts this season, and gave Spohr's Concerto in D minor, the beauties and difficulties of which are notorious; Raff's "Hungarian Caprice," from "Volker"; and combined with Mr. Hallé in a delightful interpretation of three Duets for violin and piano, by Heller and Ernst. Miss Mary Davies was the vocalist.

The third Concert of the Philharmonic Society took place on the 9th ult., and obtained special significance from the fact that it revealed to a Liverpool audience, for the first time, the Cantata which attracted such attention at the last Birmingham Festival—Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride." Not only had every effort been made to secure the success of the orchestral and choral portions of the work, but the cast of principals engaged was a very near approach to perfection, comprising Madame Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson. Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" followed, and its rendering, after the arduous requirements of the "Spectre's Bride," was creditable to all concerned. Mr. Hallé conducted the entire performance.

The engagement of Madame Adelina Patti is always a serious undertaking, and her appearance at the Philharmonic Hall, on October 30, was owing to the dual efforts of two famous entrepreneurs—Mr. Carl Rosa and Mr. de Jong. A full house and a very successful Concert was the result. Madame Patti's selections comprised the scena "Ardon gl' incensi," from "Lucia di Lammermoor," the popular "O luce di quest' anima" ("Linda di Chamounix"), Gounod's "Ave Maria," and Engel's conventional song "Darling mine." Donizetti's music is certainly most adapted to the Diva's style, and although Gounod's "Prayer" received a pronounced encore, the obligato, even expounded as it was by Mr. De Jong, was certainly never intended or fitted for the sparkling but unsympathetic flute. The other artists included Miss Marian Burton, who well earned a flattering reception, Signori Runcio and Vetta, and the accompaniments were in the safe custody of Mr. Engel and Signor Bisaccia.

The Liverpool Sunday Society, which has recently been established, aims at the laudable object of educating and interesting the masses without infringing upon the sanctity of the Sabbath. The first meeting—on the afternoon of Sunday, October 24—evidenced that music was to constitute one of the fundamental principles of the Society, and the lecture by Professor Macfarren, with practical illustrations on the evergreen subject of Handel's "Messiah," was full of interest. This auspicious inauguration has since been followed by a scholarly dissertation on the "Power of Music," by one of the founders of the Sunday Society, who bears a high local reputation, Mr. W. I. Argent.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

As the various Subscription Concert series are now in full progress, and the Birmingham Musical Association has resumed its weekly Concerts in the Town Hall, at popular prices, there is no lack here of entertainment for music lovers, but the proportion of meritorious novelty hitherto produced is very small, and the reception accorded it is hardly calculated to encourage struggling Mendelssohns or embryo Beethovens. Song and ballad are still evidently preferred to the most admirable achievements of instrumental art; and opera, especially of the comic genus, draws crowded audiences, whilst oratorio is comparatively neglected; but there are nevertheless unmistakable signs of progress here and there, and really good band performances never lack support or public appreciation.

The monthly Concert of the musical section of the Midland Institute, which took place on the 6th ult., was devoted to instrumental chamber music, relieved, as on former occasions, by a few vocal solos, contributed this time by a lady new to Birmingham, Mdle. Marie de Lido, of the Imperial Opera Company of St. Petersburg. In the instrumental section, the most important items were Mendelssohn's String Quartet in E minor (Op. 44), No. 2, and Rheinberger's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 38). The performance was a somewhat unequal one, indicating in places the need of additional rehearsal, but the playing of the quartet leader, Mr. F. Ward, was throughout unimpeachable. The Rheinberger Pianoforte Quartet, composed in 1870, was a comparative novelty in Birmingham, and on this occasion proved a very acceptable one, in virtue not only of its high intrinsic merits, and especially its abundant melody combined with scholarly workmanship, but also of the admirable manner in which it was played by the four artists concerned. Mr. Ward enchanted the audience by his finished and expressive playing of the well-known "Rêverie" of Vieuxtemps, and a couple of numbers from Spohr's Salonstücke (Op. 145). Mdle. de Lido possesses a rich full mezzo-soprano voice, and sings with refinement and feeling. Notwithstanding the attractive character of the Concert, and the almost nominal terms charged for admission, the attendance was, as usual at Chamber Concerts here, again very limited.

Nothing daunted by the indifferent success which has hitherto attended his efforts in the cause of classical chamber music, Dr. Swinnerton Heap, on the 12th ult., commenced a new series of Concerts, assisted by the same artists, with one exception, as in previous seasons—viz., Herr Ludwig Straus (solo and first violin), Mr. Speelmann (second violin), Herr Bernhard (viola), and M. Vieuxtemps (violin-cello). Dvorák's fine String Quartet in E flat (Op. 51), admirably played, furnished the overture to the Concert, and delighted the audience by its unfeigned, romantic interest, and strongly-marked individuality. Schubert's Impromptu in F minor (No. 1, Op. 142) is not the most popular of the composer's eight Impromptus; but the manner in which it was played on this occasion by Dr. Heap recommended it powerfully to popular acceptance, and it was received with marked enthusiasm. The familiar charms of Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor (Op. 49) were brought out in vivid relief by the three artists concerned, Dr. Heap, Herr Straus, and M. Vieuxtemps, after which Herr Straus gave a masterly exhibition of his skill in a Salonstücke (Op. 87), by Ferdinand Hiller. Spohr's Quintet in D minor (Op. 130) was the concluding and most substantial item of the Concert, but though admirably played, it failed to enchain the audience till the close.

At Mr. Stockley's second Orchestral Concert, on the 18th ult., an unusual feature was the presence among the audience of some four or five hundred choir boys from the various churches of Birmingham, whom the beneficiaire had graciously presented with free admissions, but though in this way Mr. Stockley had certainly done a friendly and praiseworthy service to the rising musical generation, the results from the public point of view were not quite so satisfactory, as the youthful guests were more demonstrative than discriminating in their applause, and much more appreciative of the vocal accessories than of the orchestral selections, which constituted the raison d'être of the Concert. Among the latter may be mentioned Spohr's so-called "Power of Sound" ("Weihe der Töne") Symphony, the Andante from Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor, a new MS. Overture, "New Year's Eve," by Dr. Herbert Wareing, and the March from Mendelssohn's "Athalie." The Spohr Symphony, which was taken at a much quicker tempo than was customary when the work was first introduced to this country half-a-century ago, was listened to with much interest, but with no show of enthusiasm, though it was capitally, if not faultlessly, rendered. A noticeable point in the performance was the finished playing of the violoncello solo in the Andantino by M. Albert, who, on this occasion, replaced Mr. Ould. Dr. Wareing's new Overture is the introduction to a Cantata, which was written for the Cambridge Degree of Doctor of Music, but is much more than an Academic exercise, revealing qualities of melody and invention which promise well for the Cantata. It is in full symphonic form, consisting of an introductory Andantino in A minor, followed by an Allegro appassionata, with an attractive second subject in C, which re-appears in the reprise in A major. The themes altogether are pleasing and dignified, and the orchestration is distinguished by taste, fancy, and sound musicianship. One of the gems of the Concert was the beautiful Andante from Schubert's symphonic fragment, in which the band certainly distinguished itself. In Spohr's second Duo Concertante, for violins and orchestra, in B minor (Op. 88), Messrs. T. M. Abbott and F. Ward united their efforts with excellent effect, and succeeded in rousing the enthusiasm of the audience to a high pitch. Madame Patey and Mr. B. Davies divided the honours in the vocal department. The lady repeated a former success in Haydn's Canonet "She never told her love," and produced an excellent effect in a scena, "When the golden sun," from an unpublished Cantata by Mendelssohn, when that composer was still obviously under the influence of Mozart. In Benedict's once popular song, "By the sad sea waves," Madame Patey was also very successful. Mr. B. Davies, favourably known as a member of the Carl Rosa Company, sang Donizetti's "Spirto gentil" and Blumenthal's "Requital" with much sweetness and refinement, though his voice was evidently not at its best. Mr. Stockley's conducting left nothing to be desired.

The interest of Messrs. Harrison's second Concert, which took place on the 22nd ult., centred chiefly in the performance of Madame Albani, who, though not in her best voice, owing to a cold, for which the indulgence of the audience was asked, sang with all her accustomed fervour and refinement, and nearly all her wonted brilliancy. Her rendering of Weber's scena "Softly sighs" was a masterly specimen of vocalisation; and though Elsie's Prayer, from Sir Arthur Sullivan's Cantata, was hardly so well suited to the secular surroundings of the Concert, it was sung with admirable taste and feeling. Other noteworthy efforts of the Canadian songstress were "The Blue Bells of Scotland," sung in response to an encore of the previously mentioned effort, and Gounod's "Jewel song," from Faust. Madame Antoinette Sterling gave a somewhat melodramatic, but effective, rendering of Hullah's "Three fishers," with suitable amplifications of the accompaniment that shocked the purists, and won great applause in a new and tuneful song by Cowen, "In the chimney corner." Miss Robertson showed that her voice had lost none of its old flexibility and brilliancy in an arrangement of Paisiello's "Nel cor più," with variations. Mr. Orlando Harley impressed the audience favourably by the quality of his light tenor voice in Gounod's "Lend me your aid," and Signor Foli was effective as usual in the grand "Zauberflöte" air, "Qui sdegno," besides exciting the mirth of the audience to a high pitch by his humorous singing of "Father O'Flynn." The instrumental soloists were Miss Marie Olson (pianoforte), Signor Papini (violin), and Signor Bottesini (contra-basso), all of whom acquitted themselves very creditably in pieces of minor musical interest.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

VERY appropriately, Mr. Hallé commenced, on October 28, the twenty-ninth series of his admirable Concerts by a performance largely dedicated to the distinguished musician whose sudden death in the summer so shocked us, and whose ultimate place among the leaders of art has yet to be decided. The second part of a programme, altogether interesting, was devoted to the works of Liszt, and included "Les Préludes"—played for the third time at these Concerts in 1872—the "Rhapsodie Hongroise" in F, No. 1, and, as pianoforte solos, the Rhapsodie, No. 8, and the arrangement of Wagner's "Spinnerlied." Mr. Henschel sang the ballad "Die Vätergruft," and accompanied perfectly Mrs. Henschel in "Die Lorelei." A duet from Ambrose Thomas's "Hamlet," and an air by C. P. E. Bach, "Lord! behold Thy children," completed the vocal contributions. Interesting as those parts of the programme were, the chief attraction was the rendering of Beethoven's Symphony in A, in which the orchestra displayed all its former capabilities; though not, perhaps, quite all the points which may be looked for as the season progresses, and when the players settle down into more complete unity of purpose. Following the opening Concert we had, on the 4th ult., a performance of Dvorák's First Symphony, with sundry smaller works, and Madame Albani as the vocalist; a moderately effective presentation of "St. Paul" on the 11th; and, on the 18th, a selection, in which the symphonic items were subordinated to Madame Néruda's charming solos. Madame Néruda is always welcomed here by an increasing number of young lady violinists, whose enthusiasm for the instrument has, to a very large extent, been kindled by her graceful performances. Perhaps the desire of the young girls to become fiddlers has now grown into somewhat of a craze, as in the vast majority of cases it is not likely that even a tolerable mastery of the instrument will be attained. Miss Mary Davies, in her quiet, unassuming manner, displayed great taste in two of Bennett's songs, "Dawn, gentle flower," and the "May Dew," and did a very kindly thing for English music in introducing Purcell's "Nymphs and Shepherds," so wonderfully free, graceful, and melodious for the age in which it was composed. It is necessary only to register the fact that Haydn's "La Poule" was given for the first time. For the 26th, Dvorák's "St. Ludmila" is announced, with Madame Albani, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills.

I am happy to be able to state that Mr. Hallé is recovering from the attack of pleurisy, which threatened to interrupt his public appearances, and it is hoped he will be able to resume work shortly.

The Gentlemen's Concert Society, after two Pianoforte Recitals, already chronicled, gave, on the first evening of last month, an orchestral performance, including Beethoven's C major Symphony, and some almost too well-known selections, such as Schubert's "Rosamunde" music and Delibes's "Sylvia" Suite—a not very judiciously selected programme. Herr Straus played very carefully Viextemps's Second Concerto and Ernst's Nocturne in E. Mr. Piercy replaced Mr. Lloyd, who was unable to attend, singing with taste and smoothness Handel's "Where'er you walk," and two songs set down for Mr. Lloyd. On the 10th such a Concert was given as the Concert Hall is expressly fitted for. Madame Néruda, Signor Risegari, Herr Straus, Signor Piatti, and Mr. Hallé contributed a varied and attractive selection of chamber music, among which Mendelssohn's String Quartet in E flat (Op. 12) and Beethoven's Sonata for violin and pianoforte in G (Op. 30), were most enjoyable. Brahms's Quartet for pianoforte and strings in G minor (Op. 25) formed a strong contrast—admirable as are many of its points—to the wonderfully clear and chaste first-mentioned work. Signor Piatti delighted the audience by the evidence he showed of undiminished vigour and skill.

On Saturday evenings, at the Free Trade Hall, Mr. de Jong has directed, alternately, his orchestral performances and the "Working Men's" Concerts, which are now so much the fashion. Thus we have our "Gentlemen's" Concerts and our "Working Men's" Concerts, and we fondly suppose that by such distinctions we are diminishing the evils and absurdities of rigid class lines. Probably the working men have different notions. The increased prominence which Mr. de Jong is giving to orchestral music should be cordially noticed. The introduction of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture, and of short symphonic selections, is entirely to be commended. If we could have fewer royalty ballads (with piano accompaniment) a further advantage would be gained, and a far greater compactness of effect would result. Nothing more patchy and, as a whole, unsatisfactory could be imagined than a programme largely made up of commonplace and entirely unconnected songs. Mr. de Jong may be trusted to rectify the evil as he sees clearly his way. Among his vocalists Madame Valleria has been extremely welcome. She has qualities which ought to secure for her a rank among thoughtful vocalists which she has hardly yet attained; although, to a musician, her style is always pleasing and, after the more demonstrative vociferations of popular singers, refreshing. Of Signor Papini and the great contrabassist, Bottesini, nothing new could be said, except that they fully retain their popularity at these Concerts. Miss Robertson's executive skill and great range of voice delighted the large audience.

At the Association Hall, Mr. Cross has resumed his Saturday Evening Concerts, inaugurating the season by a performance of "Judas Maccabæus," which, though creditable, left something to be desired.

On the 22nd, a small Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. Ferneley, hitherto located in Stretford, essayed a performance in the Free Trade Hall. There is still an idea that there is an opening for popular music on Monday evenings, and Mr. Ferneley announces his intention monthly to test its truth.

It is announced that Dr. Mackenzie will pay his first public visit to Manchester on the 15th inst., to distribute the certificates granted in this district by the National Society of Professional Musicians. Great interest is excited, and it is probable that our distinguished countryman will, at several entertainments given in his honour in this city and in Liverpool, receive the warm congratulations of many to whom the rapid progress English music is making in public appreciation is most welcome. It was distinctly recognised at Leeds that, in his latest work—"The Story of Sayid"—Dr. Mackenzie proved that he is gradually developing a style of his own, and freeing himself from the influence of pet lines of study. There is not a doubt that Dr. Mackenzie's visit will prove extremely interesting, and it would be a graceful tribute could performances of some of his chief orchestral works be given.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

THE multiplicity and importance of the events which are now taking place in the West Riding, afford remarkable evidence of the progress of music in this county. With scarcely an interval sufficient to isolate the Leeds Musical Festival chronologically from the ordinary fixtures, the season thus far has been one of extraordinary activity, and it promises to be even still more prolific of incident.

Mr. Rawlinson Ford opened another series of his admirable Popular Concerts at Leeds, on the 17th ult., with a performance of Berlioz's "Faust." Reference has already been made to the admirable scheme which Mr. Ford has put forward for the season, and if the remainder of his Concerts approach to anything like the degree of efficiency which marked the first, his supporters will have fresh cause to be grateful for his enterprise. The production was everything that artistic ability and carefully combined executive skill could make it. The principals were Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, with Mr. Hilton in the small solo part. The Leeds Philharmonic Society delivered the choruses with fair success, though defects were occasionally apparent in some of the more difficult numbers. Mr. Hallé's band added another to its long list of triumphs by a magnificent rendering of the orchestral score, and more especially by the clever treatment of the march and the ballet music. Mr. Hallé conducted the performance with his customary skill. For the next Concert, Mr. Hallé's band is again retained. The same work was produced at Huddersfield on the 10th ult., on the occasion of the 193rd Concert of the Huddersfield Choral Society. The principals here were Miss Davies, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Watkin Mills, and Mr. W. Bartin. The chorus was a strong one, numbering about 370 voices; and the orchestra, considering that it was gathered from many different sources, was fairly equal to the situation. Huddersfield was the first Yorkshire town in which the work had a hearing, and it has always been regarded with peculiar interest by local musicians. Neither trouble nor expense appear to have been spared by the Choral Society in the production, and the result was highly creditable to the promoters. Especially commendable is the part taken in the Concert by the Conductor, Mr. North, under whose direction the chorus more particularly gave a good account of itself. Herr Otto Bernhardt gave an artistic rendering of the instrumental obbligato in the "King of Thule" ballad, of which Miss Mary Davies, as usual, made the most. The Concert was a great success.

Mr. Edgar Haddock resumed his musical evenings at Leeds, on the 8th ult. The series announced will consist of ten Concerts of chamber music, chiefly for piano and violin. A new combination has been formed in Leeds under the auspices of Herr Alfred Christensen, to be known as "The Alfred Trio," consisting of Messrs. Christensen (piano), Alfred Eckener (violin), and Alfred Giessing (violoncello), three former fellow students of the Berlin Academy. These artists announce a series of six musical evenings for the performance of standard works for their three instruments. The first Concert of the series was given on the 10th ult., and attracted some interest, although the audience was by no means a representative one, nor large. Among other compositions performed were Beethoven's Trio in G major and Zimmermann's Suite in D minor (Op. 19). A Beethoven Concert is announced for the sixth evening.

Bradford has been in the full tide of musical incident during the month, and in addition to one Subscription Concert, there have been several excellent gatherings for the hearing of chamber music. Mr. Midgley—who deserves commendation for his courageous perseverance—gave the first Concert of his eleventh season on October 27. Vocal selections were added to the programme—a feature which met with much acceptance. In the instrumental performances, Mr. Midgley was assisted by Herr Otto Bernhardt and Mr. H. Smith. These executants gave an excellent account of Schubert's Trio in B flat and Parry's Trio in E minor. The former was abundantly enjoyed, but the latter was listened to with scarcely as much satisfaction as interest. Mr. Midgley and Herr Bernhardt each gave solos, of which good opportunity was made. The vocalists were Madame Tomlinson, Miss Hoschke, Madame Ter Meer, Miss Richardson, and Miss M. Tomlinson, who gave two important selections—Schubert's Serenade, for contralto solo and female chorus, and the Trio "Jesu, Heavenly Master," from Spohr's "Calvary."

Mr. Misdale opened a new series of Chamber Concerts in Bradford, on the 8th ult. Vocal music also entered largely into the composition of this Concert. Mr. Misdale was assisted by Mdlle. Lang in the instrumental selections, which included, among other items, Beethoven's Sonata in A minor (Op. 23), for piano and violin. Mdlle. Lang's solos were a Hungarian Rhapsody by Hansen, and one of Viextemps's compositions, in the performance of which she appeared to greater advantage than in the Beethoven Sonata with Mr. Misdale. The pianist gave a capital exhibition of his powers in the rendering of compositions by Glinka and César Cui. The vocalists were Miss Clara Jowett, Mr. Charles Blagbro', and Mr. Norman Salmond, three local artists, who sang with much approval.

Herr St. Hensé gave an Invitation Musical Soirée in Bradford, on the 3rd ult., with the assistance of his own private pupils and Signor Risegari.

The Bradford Festival Choral Society gave an excellent Concert in St. George's Hall, on the 12th ult. Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Mr. C. H. Lloyd's "Song of Balder" were the chief items of the programme. The performance of these works was highly satisfactory, particularly in the choral portions. The Bradford Festival Chorus assisted at the original production of Mr. Lloyd's work, and were therefore familiar with the score. The performance created a very favourable impression, the Finale being especially well received. Madame Annie Albu gave the solo part with much success. The other principals who took part in one or other of the two works were Miss Hyde, Mrs. Ashcroft-Clarke, Mr. C. Blagbro', and Mr. Norman Salmond. Schubert's "Rosamunde" Overture and the "Tannhäuser" March were rendered during the evening by the band.

The Saturday Popular Concerts, which were commenced in Bradford a few weeks ago, under the direction of Mr. Sewell, do not make the progress which was hoped for them, and which they deserve. The meagre support doled out to them is somewhat of a puzzle, considering the character and quality of the performances. Mr. Sewell's orchestra again was highly satisfactory in one or two important works at the Concerts on October 28 and the 14th ult. Among such compositions were Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony and "Melusina" Overture, Mackenzie's Prelude to "Colomba," the Scherzo from Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and the Overtures to "Oberon" and "Zauberflöte." At the first-named Concert Mr. John Dunn, a violinist, whose performances place him in high rank, gave several solos, and at the second the solo instrumentalist was Mr. Herbert F. Sharpe, a very fine pianist. Miss Hilda Coward and Mr. Lucas Williams were the vocalists.

The Bradford Subscription Concert season (the twenty-second) opened on October 29, with a Concert at which the attendance was probably larger than any previously recorded. The chief portion of the programme was sustained by Mr. Hallé and his band. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Spohr's "Jessonda" Overture, Tchaikowski's Concerto for piano and orchestra in G, and a selection from Rubinstein's "Bal Costumé," constituted the best features of a fine programme, and were splendidly played. Mr. Hallé also gave two compositions by Liszt. The vocalist was Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli, whose selections were from operatic works by Rossini and Wagner. The second Subscription Concert, on the 19th ult., was devoted chiefly to chamber music; in the performance of which Madame Néruda, Signor Risehari, Herr Straus, Signor Piatti, Herr Prokatzky, and Mr. Hallé were successfully associated. The programme was excellent. Schubert's delightful Quintet in A (Op. 114), "The Trout," was one of the most enjoyable things heard in Bradford for some time; and Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat (Op. 12) secured great favour. Mr. Hallé and Madame Néruda gave a brilliant rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in G (Op. 30). Solos were given by Madame Néruda and Signor Piatti. The violinist bracketed a Berceuse by F. Néruda and a Hungarian Caprice by Raffi. Signor Piatti gave two new pieces of his own for the first time—a "Canto Religioso" and a "Tempo di Minuetto," both being received with much satisfaction. Madame Patey was the vocalist.

At Harrogate, on the 12th ult., Weber's Mass in G and Romberg's Ode "The Transient and the Eternal" were produced by the Harrogate Philharmonic Society, at the first of two Subscription Concerts announced for the season.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

We were unable to notice in detail in our last month's letter one or two Concerts which were given in Bristol late in October, and must briefly call attention to them now.

Of the Saturday Popular Concert, given on October 23, not much need be said, beyond the usual and gratifying announcement of a crowded and cordial audience. The chief work given was a Cantata entitled "The Fairy Ring," and this was heard in Bristol for the first time, but did not seem to catch the fancy of the auditors very easily. The performance of band and choir certainly was not first rate, but some of the choruses are very trying, more especially the first one, and the weakness of the tenors throughout was conspicuous. The soloists worked well, and sang correctly and with spirit. They were all well known to Bristol audiences, Miss Marian Fenna being the soprano, Miss Hannah Jones, contralto; Mr. E. T. Morgan, tenor; and Mr. Lawford Huxtable, bass. The remainder of the programme consisted chiefly of popular and familiar pieces, vocal and instrumental. Mr. G. Riseley was the organist, and Mr. Gordon conducted, as usual. This was the forty-second Concert given by the Society. On the following Monday, the second of the Monday Popular Concerts was given, again to a limited audience, the show of empty seats being even more marked than at the first Concert. The chief interest centred in Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, which has several times being presented at these Concerts, and each time seems to receive a more perfect interpretation. The treatment of the exquisite Adagio calls for special notice, its numberless beauties seeming to chain the hearers in an absolute stillness very remarkable. The overture, "The Naiades," claimed its usual favour at the hands of a Bristol assembly, and was admirably played. The instrumental pieces in the second part were not very interesting, with the exception of "Il moto continuo" (Paganini), which is scored for all the strings, and has now become quite a "show piece" of Mr. Riseley's band. The vocalists were Miss Eleanor Rees and Mr. Cox. The former is an established favourite in Bristol, and fully sustained her reputation in Gounod's "Worker" and Moir's "Whiter than Snow," to the latter of which Mr. Riseley supplied a highly effective organ accompaniment. Mr. Cox was also well received in Handel's "Waft her, Angels."

The third Monday Popular Concert was given on the 8th ult., but again the numbers present were far below the capability of Colston Hall for accommodation, and we seem to hope in vain to see these powers taxed to the utmost. The whole of the first part of the programme was filled by Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," "Episode de la vie d'un Artist" (Op. 4), in five parts. This colossal work was heard in Bristol last season, and its success was no less marked last month. No praise can be too high for the way in which Mr. George Riseley offered this great work to the public, and we heartily wish he could meet with a more generous recognition of his efforts in the cause of music in his native city. Dr. Bridge conducted his Overture "Morte d'Arthur," and must have been pleased and gratified with both the performance and the reception of his work. Handel's "Largo," for strings, harp, and organ, was welcome as ever, and Liszt's Rhapsody, No. 1, in F, brilliantly played by the orchestra, closed the Concert. The vocalists were Miss Fryer, and Mr. J. F. Nash, of Bristol Cathedral. Mr. Carrington was the leader, and Mr. Riseley conducted, as usual.

The forty-third Saturday Popular Concert took place on the 20th ult., when a good miscellaneous selection was performed. Solo harp, Miss Mary George; solo organ, Mr. G. Riseley; solo cornet, Signor N. Coviello; Conductor, Mr. George Gordon.

The fourth Monday Popular Concert of this season was given on the 22nd ult. at Colston Hall, the principal work being the C minor Symphony of Beethoven (No. 5). Miss Elliott's "Dramatic" Overture received its first rendering in Bristol, and was well performed, and gained merited approval. Another novelty was the ballet music from Mackenzie's opera "Colomba," and the Concert closed with a selection from "Il Trovatore," with solos for several instruments. The vocalists were Miss Phillips, of Bath, and Mr. Bantock Pierpont, both of whom were heartily applauded in their several efforts. On the 8th inst. we look forward to hearing Mr. Prout's new "Oxford" Symphony, conducted by the composer.

The first of a series of four Chamber Concerts, to be given during the winter at Victoria Rooms, Clifton, took place on October 28, and was well attended. The executants were the same as last season—namely, Mr. Arthur Hudson, violin; Mr. E. Pavey, violoncello; and Miss Mary Lock, pianoforte. The programme included the Trio in B flat (Op. 11), Beethoven; Sonata in E minor for piano and violoncello, Walter Macfarren; Suite, No. 3, in G major (Op. 34), for violin, Ries; Piano solo, Impromptu in G flat, Chopin; Quartet, "Hungarian Dances," Brahms. Miss Lock amply maintained her position as a pianist of a high order, and did credit to Mr. W. Macfarren's training. The concerted music was well rendered, and much appreciated. Miss Amy Sconce was the vocalist, and Mr. Fred. Rootham the accompanist.

The Colston Anniversary was kept in the usual way at Bristol on the 13th ult., and two Concerts were given in the Colston Hall, at which popular programmes were provided. There was an excellent quartet party of male voices, and the soloists were Miss Fryer, Mr. Nash, and Mr. Thomas. Mr. George Riseley was the instrumentalist, and contributed several organ solos in his well-known artistic manner.

CONCONE'S LESSONS

WITH MARKS OF EXPRESSION AND PHRASING

BY

ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence each.

50 Lessons for the Medium part of the Voice.

40 Lessons for Contralto.

40 Lessons for Bass or Baritone.

The sterling value and great usefulness of Concone's Lessons have been so long recognised and so generally admitted, that their extensive adoption caused, as a natural consequence, the issue of numerous editions in almost every country where the study of the Art of Singing is cultivated. No edition, however, which has hitherto come under my notice, seems to me as correct, complete, and reliable as it should be.

I have endeavoured to rectify this deficiency by adding in the present edition signs of expression and phrasing, where I considered it expedient to do so, completing, and in some cases altering, the breathing marks, and altogether carefully revising the whole work.—ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

LONDON: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

An interesting programme was presented at the first of Mrs. Viner Pomeroy's Classical Chamber Concerts for the present season, on the 17th ult. We are glad to see that Mrs. Pomeroy has entirely recovered from her recent serious illness, and is able again to take her place at the piano at these delightful Concerts. The Quintet in E minor (Op. 1), for two violins, viola, violoncello, and contrabass (Onslow), was the first item, and was heard with great interest. A Quintet for the same instruments concluded the Concert, that of Hummel in D minor (Op. 74), and Mozart's Quartet in B flat, for strings, formed no unimportant part of the evening. Mrs. Pomeroy gave great pleasure by her pianoforte solo, Handel's Ninth Suite in G minor, and Mr. Pomeroy met with a cordial reception in his violoncello solo, "Abendlied" (Schumann). The other artists were Mr. Henry Holmes (first violin), Mr. J. Pardew (second violin), Mr. Ellis Roberts (viola), and Mr. J. Reynolds (contra-bass).

Notices of the Concerts given by the Bristol Musical Festival Society on the 26th and 27th ult. will appear in next month's letter.

The Bath Choral Union announce a performance of Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" on the 2nd inst.; and on the 23rd inst. a grand Orchestral Concert will be given by the Bath Philharmonic Society, when Gounod's "Redemption" will be performed.

The Victoria Hall, Exeter, was crowded at both the Subscription Concerts given by Mr. Farley Sinkins on October 25. The artists engaged were Mesdames Albani and Antoinette Sterling, Miss Mary Russell (in place of Miss Robertson, who was too unwell to appear), Mdle. Agnes Jansen, Mr. Orlando Harley, and Signor Foli; together with Signor Papini, violin; Signor Bottesini, double-bass; and Miss Marie Olson, pianoforte. Mr. Sidney Naylor was the accompanist.

Organ Recitals have been given at the Victoria Hall, on October 18, and the 1st, 15th, and 26th ult., by Mr. D. J. Wood, Mus. Bac., Organist of the Cathedral, and on the 22nd ult., by Mr. E. M. Vinnicombe, Organist of St. Leonard's Church.

The Vocal Union gave the twenty-third Concert in the Hamilton Hall, Salisbury, on Wednesday, the 24th ult. W. M. Hutchison's Cantata, "The Story of Elaine," formed the first portion of the programme, the soloists being Miss Kate Spary, Madame Nelmes, Mr. Kirby, and Mr. J. Stuart Higgs. The Cantata was well rendered and favourably received. The second part was a miscellaneous selection. In addition to the above-named vocalists, Mr. Hayden sang with much success, and Mr. Carter was loudly encoored for his clarinet solo. The band and chorus numbered 100. Miss Winifred Harwood accompanied at the pianoforte, Mr. J. T. Calkin led the orchestra, and Mr. John M. Hayden conducted.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

WITH the closing of the Exhibition on the last day of October the numerous Military Concerts and Organ Recitals, given in connection therewith, came to an end. At one of the most recent of the latter was performed a new composition by Herr Alfred Gallrein, entitled "Ave Maria," for organ and violoncello. The composer himself played the violoncello part, and Mr. Robertson, of Glasgow, presided at the organ.

The winter musical season opened brilliantly, on the evening of the 3rd ult., with a Concert given by Dr. Hans Richter's orchestra. The programme comprised Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," the "Lohengrin" Vorspiel, Mendelssohn's Overture "The Hebrides," Liszt's "Les Préludes," Berlioz's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation," and Beethoven's "Eroica," the latter being substituted for the expected No. 4 Symphony of Brahms. Mrs. Hutchinson sang, with charming refinement and grace, "Zeffiretti lusinghieri," from Mozart's "Idomeneo," and a recitative and aria from Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride." On the afternoon of the Saturday following, Dr. Hans Richter gave a second Concert, in which he introduced "Charfreitag's-Zauber" from Wagner's "Parsifal," and Dr. Mackenzie's "Burns"

Rhapsody, both exquisitely rendered; the Overture to the "Flying Dutchman"—which called forth rapturous applause, for, though familiar enough, it had never before been rendered with such vigour and brilliancy—and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. Mrs. Hutchinson was again the vocalist, and contributed an air of Handel's and "Absence," a song by Berlioz.

The first Concert by the Heckmann Quartet took place in the Queen Street Hall on the evening of the 12th ult. The programme consisted of selections both classical and modern, closing with the last two movements of a Quartet by Grieg, dedicated to the performers. Mr. Albert Bach chose, as usual, songs of sterling merit, "Pogner's Aurede," from Wagner's "Meistersinger," and an air from "Eury-anthe," "Wo berg ich mich"—both were given with dramatic force and good effect, the elaborate accompaniments being admirably played by Madame Bach. The second Concert, on the 20th ult., was dedicated entirely to the works of Beethoven. No less than three String Quartets, namely, the E minor (Op. 59, No. 2), the F minor (Op. 95), and the great C sharp minor (Op. 131), were given in splendid style. Herr Heckmann played, as solo, the Adagio from the Violin Concerto, and, as encore, an interesting improvised cadence on motifs from the same Concerto. Mr. Albert Bach contributed two songs, "Busslied" and "Adelaide."

Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda were welcomed once more, on the 13th ult., in the Music Hall, by a crowded audience, when they presented a finely varied programme, of which the two most interesting items were Mr. Hallé's first solo, the Schumann Fantasia in C (Op. 17), and the rarely heard Grand Fantasia in C, for violin and piano, of Schubert (Op. 159).

On the Monday following, the 15th ult., in the same Hall, Mr. Frederic Lamond paid us a farewell visit prior to his departure for Russia. Schumann's Sonata in F sharp minor, Beethoven's A flat (Op. 110), numerous pieces by Chopin, Mendelssohn, and Liszt constituted the menu, which was much appreciated, as it fully deserved to be. The "Don Juan" Fantasia, as a pièce de résistance, stood out most prominently.

In order to aid the fund for erecting a statue to the memory of Orlando Gibbons at Cambridge, an amateur Concert was given on the evening of the 17th ult., in the Queen Street Hall, by Mr. McEwen, assisted by other able amateurs. The music, both vocal and instrumental, was not of too ambitious a nature, and was very well rendered.

Mr. Carl Rosa's English Opera Company has given a series of performances at the Lyceum Theatre extending over a fortnight, and ending on the 13th ult. Among the operas produced were "Lohengrin," with Madame Marie Roze as Elsa, and Mr. Scovel as Lohengrin; "Don Giovanni," "Esmeralda," and "Carmen," the two latter being the most appreciated by the audience. The novelty was Marchetti's "Ruy Blas," which bids fair also to become a favourite.

After an absence of eight years, Edinburgh is once more favoured with an Italian Opera, at the Royal Theatre, under the direction of Mr. Mapleson, which is at present attracting audiences more select than large. It seems a curious coincidence that at least five of the operas given by the English company, "Lohengrin," "Faust," "Don Giovanni," "Carmen," and "Le Nozze di Figaro" are presented by this company also, thus affording us an interesting comparison of the respective representations. Among the principal artists are Mdles. Jenny Broch, Hélène Hastreiter, and Lilian Nordica, new to Edinburgh audiences; Signori del Puente, Foli, Runcio, Ciampi, Padilla, and De Vaschetti.

On the 22nd ult. Max Bruch's "Odysseus" was given by Mr. Waddell's choir, to a large audience. The heavy choruses received very fair treatment. Mrs. Millar Craig took the part of Penelope, and Mr. Millar Craig sustained the title rôle. A string quintet, led by Mr. Daly, with his wonted certainty of attack, accompanied by pianoforte and harmonium, did as well as could be expected in a work absolutely requiring full orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Waddell conducted with his usual efficiency. This is the third time this work has been performed by the same society.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND WEST OF SCOTLAND.

OUR musical season has set in with more than usual severity, if I may employ the figure. We had two weeks of Italian opera from the first of November, then two weeks more of English opera, and, as if that were not sufficient, another week of the Italian performances was commenced on the 29th ult. Then St. Andrew's Hall is occupied on Saturday evenings (till the Choral Union Concerts begin in the present month), with the Abstiners' Union musical entertainments, the City Hall Saturday afternoon and evening Concerts are in full operation, and there have been not a few other musical performances of more or less interest.

The Richter Orchestral Concerts, which took place on the 2nd and 5th ult., were financial failures. The gentlemen who guaranteed the project from loss will have an important deficit to make up, nearly four-fifths, as is intimated, of the amount guaranteed. Musically, the performances were interesting enough, but the public would seem to have deemed the project uncalled for, and as tending to injure the prosperity of its own annual scheme of Orchestral Concerts.

We had our annual visit from Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda on the 12th ult., in the Queen's Rooms, when there was a crowded attendance.

A Concert of Chamber Music was given for the first time in the southern district of our City on the 11th ult., in the Burgh Hall, Crosshill, Mr. William Schofield (Organist of Camphill United Presbyterian Church), Messrs. Cole, Ifit, Daly, and Walton, and Miss Corbett being the performers. A Subscription series of four Chamber Concerts is announced by Mr. W. H. Cole, our leading quartet player, to take place, the first in December and the others in the Spring, subscriptions having been received to an encouraging amount.

The inauguration of the first church organ in the neighbouring ancient Burgh of Rutherglen took place on the 10th ult. The organ referred to was erected in Wardlawhill Established Church, and was built by a local firm, Messrs. Harmer and Burfield. Mr. S. Fraser, of Queen's Park Established Church, displayed the resources of the instrument, and the choir of the church, under the honorary conductorship of Mr. W. Macintyre, sang some anthems and other sacred pieces.

An organ and vocal Recital was given in Pollokshields Established Church on the 16th ult., Mr. Alfred Heap playing several solos, and leading members of the choir contributing solos and concerted vocal music.

In Pollokshields United Presbyterian Church, on the 18th ult., the choir gave an excellent rendering of Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," which was followed by organ solos and shorter choral pieces, &c. Mr. Alexander Milln conducted, and Mr. Henry Bretton (Organist of the Church) accompanied.

At the Saturday night Concert of the 13th ult., in the City Hall, a Recital in character, but without scenery, was given of Sir Walter Scott's "Lady of the Lake," with incidental music from Sir G. A. Macfarren's Cantata of that name. Most of the characters represented sang, as well as acted, and the choruses in the Cantata were rendered by a choir of forty voices, under the direction of Mr. William Moodie. Mr. Bridgman accompanied on the piano.

A performance of Handel's Oratorio "Saul," by the South Side Choral Union, took place on the 18th ult., in the City Hall. The chorus numbered about 160 voices, and though the balance of the parts was by no means perfect, the male voices being only about a third of the whole, and of light calibre, a highly meritorious rendering was given of the melodious and impressive music. Good tone, steadiness, precision, point, and spirit were marked features of the choral singing, much praise therefore being due to Mr. McKeane, the energetic Conductor of the Society. The principals were Mrs. Smith and Miss E. Ross, and Messrs. Murray, Fleming, and Cameron, who were all satisfactory in their several parts. Mr. J. K. Findlay accompanied on the organ with skill, and with fairly good effect, considering the poorness of the City Hall instrument. There was an excellent attendance.

A Concert was given on the 19th ult., by Mr. W. J. Clapperton, Organist of Sandyford Established Church, together with members of the choir, in the Burgh Hall, Hillhead, the principal attraction in which was a number of selections from Sir Arthur Sullivan's "The Light of the World."

The Paisley Choral Union has added to its scheme for the present season a performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's new Cantata "The Golden Legend," which is to be given on April 11.

I may now state further what our musical societies are engaged in practising. The Hillhead Musical Association has chosen Gade's Cantata "Psyche." Mr. W. T. Hoock is Conductor. The Bothwell Choral Society, which is under the charge of Mr. J. McHutchinson, has selected L. N. Parker's Cantata "Silvia." Erskine Church Musical Society (Mr. Ewing, Conductor) will study Jackson's Cantata "The Year." Rutherglen Choral Society has decided on Cowen's "Rose Maiden" for the second principal piece for the season. Kilmacolm Choral Society will study Haydn's "Creation." Bluevale Established Church Choir has fixed on W. Hume's "Blind Bartimeus," the same work being the choice of Lenzie Musical Society for the second work of the season.

MUSIC IN SOUTH WALES.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

"THE Gorsedd of the Bards." When we read this in a London paper our first impulse is to ask—Is there any Gorsedd other than that of the bards? But it would be folly evidently to put any such question to "Saxon" critics. They must have their say. Write what they may, however, it is most probable—whatever attractions the Gorsedd may have—that there will be a great struggle between English and Welsh for seats in the Albert Hall, when the time for the Eisteddfod arrives. Then will come the tug of war, and then once more, after a lapse of ages, the language of the Britons will re-assert itself in "Old London."

Turning to local matters, I find there has not been a very commanding programme of musical events lately. The following references will give an idea of what has taken place.

At Cardiff, Mr. E. H. Lemare, now Organist of the Parish Church, Sheffield, gave, on October 26, the first of an intended series of Organ Recitals. In "Zadok the Priest" (Handel) and "Sanctissima" (Lux) he again evidenced the exceptional powers for which he has been locally famous. Other items of a classical, and several of a more popular character, were embraced in the programme.

Mr. W. Smith presided over an Eisteddfod at Llangamarch Wells, on the 15th ult. The Conductor was Rev. Rees Evans, Llanwrtyd, and the musical adjudicator, Mr. D. W. Lewis; pianists, Miss Julia Waters and Miss E. T. Thomas. A local choir sang "Nant y Mynydd," and was awarded the prize. Among the vocalists at the Concert in the evening were Miss Pollie Jones and Mr. Isaac Davies.

The Tredegar Choral Union, to which I have referred on a previous occasion, has been practising in view of a second performance, which will include a rendering of the "Stabat Mater" of Rossini.

At Maesteg, the local Congregational Choirs, numbering 1,000 voices, assembled in the Chapel, and sang Anthems by Mr. J. Thomas and Dr. Parry with marked effect, their leader being Mr. W. Williams. The meetings throughout the day were largely attended.

A new organ, erected at a cost of £1,100, was opened on October 27, at the old Priory Church, Brecon, by Mr. Peterson, Hereford.

With a view to assist David J. Williams, the son of a Bargoed collier, the residents of that place gave a Concert on October 31. The young man is now pursuing his studies in Llandovery College, and it was determined to make an effort to provide him with funds. A large number of local vocalists gave their services.

The Whitchurch Choral Union (near Cardiff) gave an excellent Concert under the presidency of Mr. A. J. Williams, M.P., at the latter end of October. The principal vocalists were Llinos Rhondda, Miss Lizzie Davies, Mr. James, Mr. J. John, and Mr. Rees; Conductor, Mr. Thomas; pianist, Miss Ethel Davies.

On Monday evening, the 15th ult., at Merthyr, a performance of the sacred Cantata "Ein Gwardwr" (Dr. Griffiths) was given by the Zion Welsh Baptist Choir, assisted by Mrs. Chambers, Miss Morgan, Mr. J. Richards, and Mr. W. Jenkins. Mr. Thomas Hopkins conducted, Mr. Tom Jenkins played the harmonium, and Miss Owen, daughter of the Chairman, was the pianist.

The Dowlais Harmonic Choir have undertaken to give two performances of Handel's Oratorio "Joshua" at the Oddfellows' Hall, on the 27th inst. As it appears that the Oratorio has never been rendered in South Wales before, the event will be regarded with special interest. The Society is widely known to have made great advances under the energetic conductorship of Mr. Dan Davies, A.C. The following artists have been engaged to assist on the occasion: Madame Gwenfil Davies, C.A.M., soprano; Miss Marian Price, R.A.M., contralto; Mr. Dyfed Lewis, R.A.M., tenor; Mr. D. Hughes, R.A.M., bass.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, November 10.

Two events of more than ordinary significance have taken place just in time to enable me to discuss them briefly in this letter, which is to be devoted to the first-fruits of the musical season of 1886-87. The Italian Opera Company, managed by Signor Angelo, has come and gone. The German Opera Company has opened its season with unparalleled brilliancy. The death of the Italian enterprise, measured by the public protestations of its managers and backers, was premature. It endured two and a half weeks, which was just about a fortnight and a half longer than it deserved to live. As I write, irate creditors and heartless minions of the law are haunting a hotel opposite to the Academy of Music, where, behind locked and bolted doors, sits the manager who made so brief and inglorious a career. At an up-town hotel Madame Valda receives the congratulations of her friends that she is out of an undertaking which, had she been a little more foolish or a little less decided, might have swallowed up as much of her husband's fortune as that amiable man was willing to entrust her with. Of course the crash was followed by the usual public washing of dirty linen, against which, however, in this instance, music lovers feel no inclination to protest, since the facts that are disclosing are testimony to the moribund condition of Italian opera in the world's capitals. That the last seasons of Italian Opera at the Théâtre Italien and Covent Garden were backed by some of the singers themselves, was an open secret with all who cared to know the facts. Now it appears that Signor Angelo closed the doors of the Academy of Music because he could not persuade Madame Valda to advance money to pay the orchestral performers, who refused to fiddle and blow longer for promises. Angelo says that the singer agreed to back the undertaking with £1,000, and more if necessary, and has not kept her promise; Madame Valda says that she agreed to nothing of the kind, but loaned the manager money when he needed it. One is entitled to believe either story; whichever one is accepted, the fact remains that a prima donna had to assume a portion of the risk in order to secure the opportunity to sing in Italian Opera in the United States. This fact is sufficiently indicative of the present status of Italian Opera here and elsewhere to require comment.

The Angelo Company gave nine performances of the following operas—namely, "Luisa Miller," "I Lombardi," "I due Foscari," "Un Ballo in Maschera," and "Ione." It will be seen that four of the above are early works of Verdi. There was a disposition on the part of the newspaper critics to receive the Company kindly, because the repertory was not hackneyed, none of the operas mentioned, save "Un Ballo," having been heard in New York for about twenty years. Unfortunately, however, the performances fell so far short of what the public were entitled to expect, that it was impossible for the conscientious writers to extend encouragement. Nor did the public exhibit any considerable interest in the enterprise, the receipts for the nine performances, according to the manager's statement, being less than one-third of the expenses. A large proportion of the salaries of singers and musicians were unpaid when the crash came, and we heard the usual stories of wretchedness and suffering on the part of the choristers and some of the principals, who are left without money or occupation in a strange land.

The promises are that the management of the German Opera will have a very different account to render at the close of their season. On the first night the house was crowded from top to bottom, and the appearance of the boxes was as brilliant as was ever known in New York. The institution has established itself in the good graces of the goddess fashion, and in consequence its continued prosperity is as good as assured. The first opera was Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba," which had already been heard fifteen times in this city; yet the interest in the work did not seem to have been diminished, except on the part of the musical cognoscenti, who have failed to discover much depth or inventiveness in its score. The strong hold which it has on the public is doubtless nine-tenths due to the sumptuousness of its stage dress, which is perhaps more magnificent than any that has ever been bestowed on the work. The new dramatic singer of the company, Frau Herbert Förster, made her American début as the Queen, and won a distinct success. She comes from the opera at Stuttgart, and is a singer and actress of fine qualities. The American Opera Company has been preparing actively for a campaign, which will be extended over the principal cities of the United States, beginning at Philadelphia, on the 15th inst. The managers of the enterprise have taken a leaf out of Mr. Carl Rosa's book of experiences, and their chief activities this season will be in what Londoners would call "the provinces." They have also made a concession to the idea of fashion, and have changed their local field of operations to the Metropolitan Opera House. I am told that they secured this theatre rent free, on condition that they would not give representations in New York city during the continuance of the German season. The latter will end on February 26, and the first performance of the American Company will be given two days later.

Mr. Theodore Thomas's obligations to the American Opera necessitated a rather awkward arrangement of his Popular Concerts, of which four have been given. The fifth will not take place until February 22, and then we shall have two a week until the series of sixteen is finished. The contest which Mr. Thomas began against the Musical Protection Union at the beginning of the last season, has had a judicial termination in his favour, and the result is seen in several changes in the personnel of the local orchestras. It will be remembered that the point at issue was as to the legality of a bye-law of the Union, which prohibited members from playing with non-members, and made a six months' sojourn in the United States a condition precedent to entrance in the Union. Mr. Thomas's first oboe player having deserted him, he imported another from Belgium, and when the Union assessed the prescribed penalty against him and his men appealed to the Courts. The decision was that such a bye-law was illegal, on the ground that it was in restraint of trade. Of course we have already an influx of new men from Germany, and shall have more. Mr. Thomas has added some of the new men to his orchestra, and several of the old have joined the Symphony Society, and now play under the bâtons of Herr Seidl, Mr. Walter Damrosch, and Mr. Frank van der Stucken. The result has been to the advantage of the organisations controlled by these men; and the differences between their performances, in tone and refinement of expression, are not so great as they have been heretofore. In the four Concerts given by Mr. Thomas, he brought forward half-a-dozen novelties, of which two were English compositions published in score by Novello, Ewer and Co.—namely, Mr. Gadsby's "Forest of Arden," and Sir Arthur Sullivan's Overture in C, "In Memoriam." Both works were heard with interest, and were appreciatively reviewed by the press critics. Of the novelties, not English, the most favour was won by Tchaikowski's "Marche Slave" and Jean Louis Nicodé's "Jubilee" March. Mr. van der Stucken and Mr. Damrosch, in the first of the Chickering Symphonic and Symphony Society Concerts, respectively, gave hearings to the works of American composers. The former brought forward a poetically conceived Symphonic Poem entitled "Ophelia," by E. A. MacDowell, a young American resident in Germany, where he is a professor of harmony in a musical conservatory. Mr. Damrosch's American novelty was a Symphony in A major, by Arthur Bird, at present a student of music in Berlin. In respect of musical orthodoxy, Mr. Bird is a Hebrew of the Hebrews. Had he not been, he would probably not have essayed so ambitious a flight at the beginning of his creative career. But he is a talented man, and many an older and more experienced composer would gladly have accepted the paternity of his Symphony. It was performed at last summer's meeting of the Tonkünstler-versammlung in Sondershausen, when, also, Mr. van der Stucken (who despite his Netherlandish name is a native American), brought forward several numbers of his excellent incidental music to Shakespeare's "Tempest." The Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are exciting more admiration than ever, since Mr. Gericke strengthened the weak places in the wind choirs of the band, and connoisseurs in New York are awaiting the Concerts which have been projected in this city with interest, which almost borders on anxiety. Liszt's "Christus" has been chosen as the third work to be performed by the Oratorio Society of this city. Of course, the choice was suggested by the death of the composer.

THE prospectus of the Belfast Philharmonic Society promises four Subscription Concerts during the season 1886-87, the first of which was announced for the 12th ult., with a miscellaneous programme. The second, on the 9th inst., will also be miscellaneous, and for the third and fourth Concerts it is intended to perform Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" and Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty," for the first time in Belfast. Amongst the artists engaged are Madame Albani, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Robertson, Miss Hope Glenn, Mlle. Agnes Jansen, Mr. Orlando Harley, Mr. Farley Sinkins, Mr. Frederic King, and Signor Foli, vocalists; and Mr. Carrodus, Signor Papini, Signor Bottesini, Miss Marie Olson, and Mr. Sidney Naylor, instrumentalists. Handel's "Messiah" will be performed at an extra Concert in Christmas week; and three Chamber Concerts (at two of which the Heckmann Quartet are to appear) will be given, provided a sufficient subscription is obtained. Herr Adolf Beyschlag will be, as usual, the Conductor, this being the sixth season in which he will have occupied that post, both with credit to himself and benefit to the Society.

HERR BONAWITZ resumed his highly interesting, and, from an educational point of view alone, highly meritorious Historical Harpsichord and Pianoforte Recitals on October 30, at the Portman Rooms, Baker Street, the second Recital of the series having taken place on the 20th ult. The scheme of these performances is the same as in previous seasons, the programmes ranging over the entire field of pianoforte music, the earlier numbers being played on a very fine Tschudi harpsichord kindly provided for these Concerts by Messrs. Broadwood and Sons. The remaining Recitals are announced to take place on the 11th inst., and on January 15, February 12, and March 19 of next year.

MR. HERMANN FRANKE announces a series of six evening and six afternoon Chamber Concerts, at Steinway Hall, at each of which the Heckmann Quartet will appear. The Evening Concerts (commencing on the 6th inst.) will be devoted respectively to Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, and "Modern Composers"; and the Afternoon Concerts to Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Beethoven, and "Modern Composers," two of the Soirées, and two of the Matinées consisting of Beethoven's music.

WE are requested to state that intending Guarantors of the next series of the Philharmonic Society's Concerts should send their names to the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. C. E. Stephens, 37, Howley Place, Maida Hill, without delay, as the list is about to appear. We learn that about £1,800 has been already promised. There has been no call made on the Guarantors for the past three years.

THE monument to be erected by public subscription over the grave of the late Mr. Joseph Maas has arrived from Italy. It will forthwith receive the finishing touches in the studio of Mr. Currie, Oxford Street, and be "unveiled" on an early day.

AT the monthly meeting of the Musical Association, held on Monday, the 1st ult., a Lecture was given on "The Registers of the Human Voice," by Mr. Emil Behnke. Mr. T. L. Southgate was nominated chairman, and, in introducing the lecturer, referred to the musical value of his researches, in conjunction with Dr. Lennox Browne, in illustrating the mechanism of the human voice. Mr. Behnke briefly referred to the laryngoscope by means of which the three registers could be demonstrated in the throat—viz., chest, falsetto, and head. Valuable as was the use of this instrument, and what it had revealed to us, it allowed only the upper surface of the vocal ligaments to be seen in action. He had, therefore, designed and successfully used a new apparatus for the thorough illumination of the throat, after the manner of the sun shining through a person's ears. The apparatus consists of a large box lined with iron in which is placed an electric light of 10,000 candle power; a tube attached to the box has its other end placed against the outside of the throat, just below the larynx. The room is then darkened, and this enormously powerful electric light now actually penetrates the throat. A laryngeal mirror is employed in the usual way, and it is practically demonstrated, what had previously been theoretically ascertained, that the vocal ligaments actually collapse at the change from chest to falsetto, thereby proving the scientific accuracy of the terms thick register and thin register. In the former the bulk of the vocal ligaments is so great as to allow the light below them to be perceived only through their inner edges, while in the latter the vocal ligaments become quite transparent, which clearly shows that their entire bulk must have been considerably diminished. We now know that when a scale is sung as the voice passes from one register to the other, the mechanism by which the sounds are produced undergoes a distinct change, nature employing a somewhat different mode in each division of the voice. The value to the professional voice-trainer of the knowledge thus gained can hardly be overrated. It shows that the voice should be cultivated and trained according to the limits which nature has laid down for each portion of the organ. The points at which the changes occur are well defined, and it is clear that one of the chief efforts of the singing master should be directed to bridging over the breaks by exercises calculated to obliterate the distinction between the various registers, and thus allow the voice to pass evenly from one to the other. Mr. Behnke exhibited a diagram symbolising the varying thickness of the registers as they proceeded upwards, and showing the positions at which the breaks generally occur. He stated that in the case of finished and accomplished vocalists the distinctions between the various mechanisms he had described at the outset hardly existed; culture and practice had rendered the voice one complete organ, instead of being divided into different portions as it was found in most untrained singers. The lecturer condemned the forcing process to which some masters subject their pupils' voices, and showed that by skill the registers could be made to overlap, and optional tones be sung at the top of each lower register. An interesting discussion followed the Lecture, in which the Chairman, Messrs. J. S. Curwen, Dunstan, McNaught, Dr. Pearce, H. Klein, and Dr. Lennox Browne took part.

THE first Concert of the thirteenth season of the Crouch End Choral Society took place on October 26, at Christ Church Schoolroom, Crouch End, and was devoted to the benefit of the Conductor (Mr. Alfred J. Dye), who has for thirteen years directed the Society. He was ably assisted by the following artists, who kindly gave their services:—Miss Margaret Cockburn, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Marie Middleton, Mr. Lawrence Freyer, Mr. Percy Palmer, Mr. Sydney Beckley, Mr. Egbert Roberts, and Mr. Frank Ward. Mr. Edmund Woolhouse contributed two violoncello solos, and Messrs. J. G. Callcott and Alfred J. Dye acted as Conductors.

WE have pleasure in drawing attention to a new instrument, called by the inventor, Mr. W. Marshall, the "Chordarmia," chiefly intended to take the place of the pianoforte in accompanying the voice, and of a peculiar construction. The instrument, which has already met with the approval of a number of vocalists, may be viewed at Neumeyer Hall, Hart Street, Bloomsbury.

THE members of the South London Musical Club gave their forty-eighth Smoking Concert on the 9th ult., and their twenty-fourth Musical Evening on the 16th ult. The men's voice concerted music on each occasion consisted of "The Sailor's Song" (Hatton), "Night in the forest" (Schubert), "The cloud-cap't towers" (Stevens), "Hymn to Bacchus" (from Mendelssohn's "Antigone"), "Corydon's Song" (Horsley), "On the sea" (Abt), "Take thy banner" (Coward), "Lützow's wild chase" (Weber), and "In autumn we should drink, boys" (Marschner). At the Smoking Concert, Mr. W. M. Wait (Organist of St. Andrew, Undershaft) played four organ solos, two being in response to encores; and Messrs. Garratt, Richardson, Spurling, and Twiss contributed songs. At the Musical Evening (Ladies' night), the club was assisted by Miss Kate McKrill, Miss Annie Buckland, and Mr. W. C. Hann (violinello), all of whom were successful. Mr. C. Stevens (Musical Director) conducted, and Mr. G. B. Lissant presided at the pianoforte.

THE first Choral Festival of the Spitalfields Association of Choirs was held on Monday, the 1st ult., at the church of St. Mary Matfelon, before a crowded congregation. The choir, numbering 400 voices, was drawn from churches in the localities of Bethnal Green, Spitalfields, and Whitechapel. There was no attempt at difficult or elaborate music; the intention of the promoters being to give a simple choral Evening Service. The Responses were Tallis's, the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Bunnett in F, and the Anthem was "All Thy works," by T. Mee Pattison. Mr. W. H. Ward, Organist of St. John's, Bethnal Green, who has the training of the various choirs connected with the Association, conducted, and had his forces well under control, marked attention being paid to expression. The solo and the semi-chorus in the Anthem were tastefully rendered by the members of St. John's Choir, and Mr. Kusel, Organist of St. Mary's, accompanied throughout.

A SUCCESSFUL Concert was given by the choir of Wycliffe Congregational Church, under the direction of the Choirmaster, Mr. George Merritt, G.T.S.C., on Friday, the 19th ult., assisted by Miss Rose Dafforne, Miss A. Wilmot Briggs, Miss Annie Hood, and Mr. T. H. Mullerhausen. Mr. G. E. Hedges presided at the organ, Miss Marian Bonallack at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. P. Sinclair conducted. The principal items in the programme were a fine rendering of Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm "Lord, how long wilt Thou forget me," by the choir (the solo by Miss Dafforne); and an equally good performance of an Anthem by the Choirmaster, for orchestra, soli, and chorus, "Cry aloud and shout," Miss Briggs, Miss Hood, Miss Dafforne, and Mr. Mullerhausen were highly successful in their vocal solos, and the orchestra gained an encore for Mendelssohn's "Athalie" March, as did also Miss Bonallack and Mr. Hedges in Beethoven's Adagio, third Symphony, arranged as an Organ and Piano duet.

A CONCERT took place at the City Temple, Holborn Viaduct, on Thursday evening, the 11th ult., under the direction of Mr. E. Minshall, the Organist. The vocalists were Mrs. Parker, Miss Maud Harding, and Mr. W. H. Webb, all of whom were well received. Miss Kate A. Davis played three pianoforte solos with effect. Miss Adela Duckham, in her violin solos, exhibited mastery over the instrument, and she also played Weber's "Rondo Brillant" on the pianoforte, for which she was recalled. Miss Davis accompanied Miss Duckham in her violin solos.

HERR PEINIGER announces that his autumn Recital will take place on the 3rd inst., at Prince's Hall, commencing at three o'clock, the programme being entirely devoted to the Chamber-music compositions of M. Saint-Saëns. The artists are—pianoforte, M. Saint-Saëns; violin, Herr Peiniger and Mr. Percy Ould; viola, Mr. Ellis Roberts; violoncello, Mr. Charles Ould; double bass, Mr. J. Haydn Waud; trumpet, Mr. W. Morrow.

It is reported that the proprietorship of the Richter Concerts has passed from Mr. Franke to Messrs. Chappell and Co. This change, we presume, will not affect the character and objects of the enterprise, although it is desirable, perhaps, to work under the guidance of a more eclectic spirit.

THE sixth annual Festival of the "Associated Choirs of the Deanery of Kensington" was held on Thursday, the 18th ult., at All Saints' Church, Kensington Park. The choir numbered about 180 voices. The music included Chants by E. H. Birch, Hymn tunes by H. R. Bird, G. Ernest Lake, and Thomas Pettit, and the Old Hundredth Psalm. The Service was Tours's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F (substituted for Selby in C), and the anthems "Hallelujah" (Handel), and "Blessing, Glory" (Tours). The whole of the music was excellently performed and produced a fine effect. Mr. Thomas Pettit, Organist of St. Peter's, Cranley Gardens, presided at the organ with great ability, and the Conductor was Mr. G. Ernest Lake, Organist of All Saints' Church. A fine selection of organ music was rendered before and after the service by Messrs. E. H. Birch, Miss Mac., Oxon., and H. R. Bird, Organist of St. Mary Abbots.

THE Festal Services at St. Philip's, Sydenham, in connection with the Dedication Festival, were held on Sunday evening, October 31, and on Sunday, the 7th ult., under the direction of the Organist, Mr. Battison Haynes. The organ and choir were augmented by a quartet of trumpets and trombones, the additional brass parts being arranged by the Organist, whose setting of the "O Salutaris" was most effectively sung by Mr. E. C. Crump. The music performed at the High Celebration, on the 7th ult., consisted of Introit (Redhead); Kyrie, Creed, Sanctus, Gloria (Garrett in D); Benedictus, Agnus Dei (B. Haynes in E flat); and "O Salutaris" (B. Haynes). At Evensong, Magnificat and Nunc dimittis "Parisian" (Stainer), and Anthem "I was glad" (Elvey). After Evensong, on the 7th ult., Mr. Haynes played as voluntary Handel's "Hallelujah."

THE Saturday Popular Organ Recital at the Bow and Bromley Institute, on the 13th ult., was given by Mr. W. G. Wood, professor at the Royal Academy of Music. His selections included Handel's Overture "Athaliah," Prelude and Fugue in A minor (Bach), Offertoire in G (Wély), Selection from Gounod's "Faust," and a new composition by himself, Allegro (in form of Minuet). This was so well received that Mr. Wood had to repeat it. Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" (solo, Miss Fanny Bristowe) and songs and part-songs agreeably diversified the programme. Mr. Fountain Meen was the accompanist, and Mr. W. G. McNaught conducted.

THE members of the St. George's Glee Union gave their 217th Consecutive Monthly Concert on the 5th ult. Miss Madeline Hardy, Miss Edith Touzeau, Miss Maud Leslie, Miss Clara Myers, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Alec Marsh were the vocalists. Mr. A. F. Pattison played a clarinet solo, and Miss Emily Tate two pianoforte solos. The part-singing included compositions by the Earl of Mornington, Danby, Bennett, Bishop, Benedict, Pinsuti, and Horsley; "There is beauty" (Sir John Goss), and "Haste ye soft gales" (Martin), being sung as quartets by members of the St. George's Glee Union. Mr. F. R. Kinkead was the accompanist, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

THE first and second parts of Haydn's "Creation" were sung at St. Saviour's Church, Herne Hill Road, on Thursday evening, October 28. The soprano solos were interpreted in a highly commendable manner by Miss Alice Patten. The other vocalists were Mr. John Ridding, R.C.M., and Mr. Joseph Gostick. The choral numbers were delivered with a fair amount of precision by the church choir, largely augmented for the occasion; the accompaniments consisting of organ and orchestra. Mr. G. A. Higgs, F.C.O., the director of music at the church, conducted with care and ability, and Mr. A. Lake, R.A.M., presided at the organ.

MISS EDITH RUTHVEN gave a successful Concert at the Vestry Hall, Turnham Green, on Thursday, the 11th ult. Miss Ruthven, who possesses a good soprano voice, was heard to advantage in Weber's Scena, "Softly sighs," in "An old garden," by Hope Temple (encored); and in Blumenthal's Duet "A Venetian Boat Song," with Miss Helen Killik. Songs were contributed by the last-named artist, also by Mr. North Home and Mr. George Gear, with much effect, several encores being demanded. Mr. Giuseppe Dinelli was warmly applauded in some violoncello solos.

At St. Stephen's, South Kensington, on St. Simon and St. Jude and All Saints' Days, Harvest Festival Services were held with augmented choir and an orchestra. At all the services the church was crowded. Matins and Holy Communion were sung to Smart in F and Eyre in E flat, and the Anthem was E. H. Thorne's "All Thy works praise Thee, O Lord." Evenson was sung to Tours in F, and the Anthem was Haydn's "Creation," the soloists being Master Humm, Mr. Frederick Cundy, and Mr. H. V. Broughton-Black. Mr. Arthur Trickett presided at the organ, and Mr. Hamilton Robinson (Organist and Choir-master of St. Stephen's) conducted.

A CONCERT was given in Morley Hall, Hackney, in aid of various charities in connection with South Hackney Parish Church, on the 20th ult. Lady Randolph Churchill played three pianoforte solos, and was presented with a bouquet by the Hackney Conservative Association. The principal vocalists were Madame Rose Hersee, Miss Grace Clare, Mr. Barrington Foote, and Mr. N. Webb. Mr. Furness Peters played a violin solo, and Signor Odoardo Barri conducted. There is every reason to suppose that the Concert will prove to be a pecuniary success.

HARVEST Festival Services were held at St. Matthew's Church, Oakley Square, N.W., on Sunday, October 31. The preacher in the evening was the Rev. W. Ostle (from St. Bartholomew's Hospital), who in the course of his remarks congratulated the congregation on the improvement that had taken place in the musical part of the services since he was last among them. The singing of the choir, which is only of one month's standing, reflected great credit on the young Organist, Mr. John E. Passmore.

At St. Saviour's Church, St. George's Square, on Wednesday, October 27, the church choir, augmented by members of the Grosvenor Choral Society, gave a fine performance of Weber's Harvest Cantata. The principal vocalists were Mrs. D. Woodhouse, Miss Gibbs, Master Hall, Messrs. E. L. Fredericks, and T. Davies. Mr. Albert Wood and Mr. C. Gibsons presided at the organ and pianoforte respectively, and Mr. David Woodhouse (Organist and Choir-master of the church) conducted.

THE Kyrie Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of "Samson" in St. Andrew's Church, Peckham, on the 10th ult., and a performance of "St. Paul," on the 17th, in St. Mary's Church, Poplar. On the first occasion the soloists were:—Miss Ethel Harrison, Mrs. Oram, Mr. Henry Yates, and Mr. James Blackney; on the second, Mrs. Stanesby, Miss Ellen Cooper, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Jabez West. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society held their 177th monthly Concert, at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road, S.W., on Friday, the 19th ult. The programme consisted of part-songs by Mendelssohn, Hatton, Lemmens, Fanning, Adam, Taubert, Moir, and Bishop. Songs were given by Miss Kate Milner, Miss Kate E. Fountain, Miss Kelly, and Mr. Frank May. Mr. T. F. Williams gave a concertina solo, Mrs. T. P. Frame presided at the piano, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

A PERFORMANCE of Spohr's "Last Judgment," with organ accompaniment, will be given in St. Peter's Church, Eaton Square, on the 16th inst., at 8 p.m., no tickets of admission being required. After Christmas "The Messiah" will be performed, and every Thursday from Christmas to Lent Organ Recitals, interspersed with vocal music, will be given. These performances are especially intended for the poor of the parish, and to give an opportunity for all to hear the superb organ and choir of the Church.

ON Saturday, the 6th ult., a Concert was given in the rooms connected with the Union Chapel, Islington. The vocalists were Miss H. Ormarez, R.A.M., Mr. K. Sutton, and Mr. Lovett King. A flute duet and solos were contributed by Mr. H. J. and S. D. Derham, and pianoforte solos by Mr. F. E. Choveaux, who was also an able accompanist.

THE anxiety of the public to possess souvenirs of the late Joseph Maas was shown in extraordinary measure at the recent sale of the regretted artist's effects, many of the "lots" being disposed of at much above their original cost.

A NEW Choir, under the title of the Finsbury Park Male Voice Choir, formed by members of the Hornsey Wood Musical Society, has just been organised by the Hon. Sec., Mr. P. L. Deighton. The choir will be under the direction of Herr Franz Leideritz, and will meet for practice in the Masonic Room, Hornsey Wood Tavern, Seven Sisters Road, on the second, third, and fourth Friday every month, at eight o'clock. The Secretary's address is 3, Carlton Road, Finsbury Park, N.

WE have much pleasure in once more recording the publication of that handsome and interesting volume "The Girl's Own Annual," the contents of which, both in original articles and illustrations, are in every respect fully equal to its predecessors. When we say that amongst the musical contributors to the work we find the names of Misses Cecile Hartog, C. A. Macrone, Oliveria Prescott, and Maud Valérie White, our hearty recommendation of the book needs no apology.

THE prospectus of the Dover Harmonic Society for the season 1886-87 announces that Haydn's "Creation" will be produced during the present month. Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty" in February, 1887, and Mozart's Twelfth Mass and Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron" in May. The Conductor of the Society is Mr. J. W. Howells, and Mr. Albert Hill is hon. secretary and accompanist.

THE prospectus of the fifteenth season of the Apollo Musical Club, Chicago, promises four Subscription Concerts, the first of which—devoted to a performance of Berlioz's "Faust"—was announced for the 23rd ult.; and at the second Concert, on the 28th inst., Handel's "Messiah" will be given. In the vocal department Mr. William Ludwig and Mr. D. M. Babcock have already accepted engagements.

THE name of the sacred Cantata written by Signor Bottesini for the Norwich Festival next year has been changed from "Getsemane" to "The Garden of Olivet." We may add that the work is of a meditative and devotional character, in this respect resembling the "Passion" of Bach and Handel. There are two parts, respectively entitled "The Agony" and "The Betrayal." Report speaks very highly of Signor Bottesini's music.

WE have received a copy of "The Conservatoire Music Register," arranged for one Term, by A. Lester Draper, the object of which is to preserve a record of the course of a pupil's study. It is intended that the amount of regular practice, the works performed, and the Professor's report at each lesson shall be entered regularly in the book; and for this purpose there can be no doubt of the value of Mr. Draper's little Register.

ON St. Simon and St. Jude's day, October 28, a Full Choral Service was held at St. Jude's Church, Upper Chelsea. The Services were by Goss (in A) and the Anthem "O praise the Lord," by the same composer. The Choir was reinforced by members of St. Simon's Church and friends, in all about fifty. Mr. Henry O. Stevens, the Organist of St. Jude's, accompanied the Service, Mr. Henry A. Evans of St. Simon's contributing the Voluntaries.

IN connection with a large meeting of tradesmen, held under the auspices of the Shop Hours' League, in the Assembly Hall, Mile End Road, on the 3rd ult., Mr. Frederick W. Howland gave a Recital on the fine organ built by Messrs. Bevington and Sons. The programme consisted of selections from Clark, Smart, Mendelssohn, &c. Both the execution and expression of the comparatively young organist elicited the warmest marks of approbation from the audience.

THE report that Mr. Leslie Crotty and Miss Georgina Burns (Mrs. Crotty) are about to secede from the Carl Rosa Opera Company is, we believe, quite accurate. It is also true that they propose to organise a company of their own, exclusively for performances in the provinces. Whatever may be the result of the venture, no one can say that there are not two good artists at its head.

At a recent meeting of the Committee of the Mendelssohn Scholarship Fund, a resolution was passed inviting Mr. Joseph Bennett to join that body. The invitation has been accepted.

A SUCCESSFUL entertainment was given to the patients of Brompton Hospital, on Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., by Mr. John Elwin, an old and valued friend of the Charity. He was ably assisted by Mrs. Elwin, Miss Richmond, the Misses Pawle, Mr. Pawle, Mr. Duncan Fleet, and other friends; Mr. Elwin's singing was a special feature in the programme.

MESSRS. CHALLEN AND SONS have invented an instrument called the "Dulcephone," the object of which is to enable pianoforte pupils to practise technical exercises without distressing the nerves of those possessing sensitive organisations. For schools and colleges we have little doubt that this contrivance will be found most valuable, especially as it can be easily applied to any ordinary cottage or grand pianoforte.

A RECITAL was given in St. Barnabas', Kentish Town, by Mr. H. W. Weston, A.C.O., on the 20th ult., on the new organ built for the church by Mr. A. Monk. The programme included works by Bach, Handel, Haydn, Rheinberger, Wagner, &c., and Mr. W. Moore sang "Every valley" ("Messiah"), and "If with all your hearts" ("Elijah").

AN Organ Recital will be given by Mr. W. T. Best in Highbury Quadrant Congregational Church, on the evening of the 15th inst. The programme will comprise selections from the works of Bach, Handel, Morandi, Salomé, Sullivan, a posthumous Andante by Bizet, and two compositions by Mr. Best.

THERE is some hope that Madame Schumann may be persuaded to visit England again next spring, and take her old place on the Popular Concert platform. Meanwhile it is likely that another of her pupils will assist Miss Fanny Davies in keeping before our musical public the principles and practice of a genuine school of "pianism."

MR. G. AUGUSTUS HOLMES gave his usual monthly free Organ Recital at St. George's, Camberwell, on Sunday afternoon, the 21st ult. The programme, which comprised selections from the works of Guilman, Calkin, Salomé, Mendelssohn, and others, was rendered in a very excellent manner, and listened to by a large congregation.

MR. WALTER W. WINDLE, Organist and Choirmaster to Belper Church, and Choirmaster to Heage Church, &c., has been offered and has accepted the Conductorship of Ripley (Derby) Choral Union. The work in hand is "Judas Maccabæus." Mr. Windle succeeds the late Mr. Woodward, of Derby, and Mr. Taylor, of Nottingham.

THOSE interested in the services in celebration of Her Majesty's Jubilee, which will no doubt be numerous during the coming year, will be glad to learn that an Anthem specially written for the occasion by an eminent church composer, will appear in an early number of THE MUSICAL TIMES.

THE first evening Concert in connection with the Denmark Place Cricket Club took place on Friday, the 19th ult., at the Lecture Hall, Coldharbour Lane, Camberwell, before a large and appreciative audience. There was an excellent programme, and the singing of Miss Ella Thomson and Mr. Alfred Pawsey was much admired.

ON All Saints' Day a performance was given of Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" at the Church of All Saints', Putney Common. The accompaniments were played by a professional string orchestra and the organ. The Magnificat was sung to Martin in C. Mr. C. S. Jekyll conducted, and Mr. H. Dancey, F.C.O., was at the organ.

IN consequence of the Christmas holidays, it will be necessary to go to press with the December number of THE MUSICAL TIMES earlier than usual. Notices of Concerts, advertisements, &c., should reach the office not later than the 23rd inst.

A SERIES of Organ Recitals are being given fortnightly after the seven o'clock Sunday night service, at Quebec Chapel, Bryanston Street, by the Organist, Mr. Edward G. Croager. The next Recital will take place on the 12th inst.

THE second Concert which was to have been given in Dublin in connection with Madame Patti's short tour did not take place, owing, it is said, to the great singer's illness. Another report states that very few tickets were sold.

MR. AND MADAME DE PACHMANN have left England for the Continent, where they purpose staying a year or so, during which time Madame de Pachmann will make her reentrée as a pianist.

MR. ARTHUR THOMPSON, Principal Tenor to the Foundling Chapel, and Mr. David Strong, have been appointed Professors of Singing at the Guildhall School of Music.

THE Committee of the Norwich Festival have, we believe, determined to include Sullivan's "Golden Legend" in their programme.

MR. F. H. COWEN has begun work upon his Worcester Oratorio, and the whole of Mr. Joseph Bennett's libretto will shortly be in his hands.

VERDI's new opera will be published by Ricordi about the end of January next. There will be an English version of Boito's text.

GOUNOD's Third Messe Solennelle ("De Pâques") will be performed at St. Alban's Church, Holborn, on the morning of Christmas Day.

WE congratulate the Guildhall School of Music upon the probable accession to its teaching staff of Mr. Prosper Sainton.

REVIEWS.

English Glee and Part-Songs; an Enquiry into their Historical Development. By W. A. Barrett.

[Longmans, Green and Co.]

THIS is a well printed volume of 351 pages, pleasant to read, and not too dry or technical. The history of the English glee is a subject full of interest to all students of musical art, and the author speaks enthusiastically and with unstinted praise of the many geniuses who have enriched this emphatically native English school with the products of their learning and fancy. It is to be hoped that the timely appearance of this volume will induce other musicians to follow in the steps of the author and endeavour to make themselves acquainted with a branch of vocal art at present unhappily neglected and almost forgotten. A reference to the pages of this volume will indicate what composers have most excelled, whose works would repay careful study and efficient performance. In regard to the latter, Mr. Barrett makes some excellent remarks as follows: "Another practice which is generally observed in the treatment of glees in the present day cannot be too strongly deprecated. It is that of dealing with them as if they were part-songs or choruses. The glee should be given with one voice to a part, otherwise the elegance and grace of its character are completely destroyed, and the work suffers greatly by being reduced to mechanical utterance. It is essentially an artistic creation, which requires sympathetic and artistic treatment. The greater number of those who sing glees after this manner can never form any idea of their beauties."

Should this work re-appear in a second edition, a few blemishes might well be removed. It appears from the preface that the matter was originally read as a series of lectures at the City of London College, but all trace of this has disappeared from the text, excepting on page 58, where there is an awkward reference to "the next lecture." Occasionally the sentences are somewhat vague and need revision. On page 6 of the preface we read, "The words of many of the best specimens generally contain some epigrammatic sentence or conceit." On page 48, there is a quotation from Naumann's "History of Music," edited by Sir F. Ouseley, a work accessible to the English student, but Mr. Barrett has unfortunately only named the German title of the book.

On page 68, referring to the Eisteddfodau, or assemblage of bards, our author says, "these meetings, under Royal Commission, were held down to the reign of Queen Elizabeth," but the fact remains that the Eisteddfodau had fallen into abeyance until 1568, when Elizabeth granted a commission for the summoning of the Welsh Eisteddfodau.

Mr. Barrett is justly eloquent in speaking of Purcell, but he makes a strange blunder on page 165, where he says "Dryden, who was one of the warmest admirers of Purcell, wrote the Ode 'Alexander's Feast' for him to set to music. Why this was not done cannot now be ascertained. It is stated that the poet's soul was vexed at the non-compliance of the musician, and that their friendship was interrupted by the matter." A reference to the life of Purcell, by Cummings, would have shown that Dryden wrote "Alexander's Feast" two years after Purcell's death.

On page 178, Mr. Barrett names "John Church, of Windsor." Why of Windsor? It is supposed that he was born there, but it is certain that he was master of the choristers of Westminster Abbey for upwards of thirty years, and was buried in the cloisters of that church. Mr. Barrett is somewhat severe in his remarks on Tosti's "Florida song" (pages 193-4), nevertheless the work was considered sufficiently excellent to be published in German (Berlin, 1757) and in French (Paris, 1874).

In estimating the comparative merit of Webbe, Callcott, and Horsley, Mr. Barrett gives the palm to the first-named, and asserts that the "golden age" of glee writing ended with him, but our own reading compels us to dissent from that conclusion. We think both Callcott and Horsley have left far finer specimens of the school than can be found in the compositions of Webbe. We could have wished that Mr. Barrett had added to the value of his book by occasional musical examples—if only a few bars here and there. Surely Horsley's glee, "Blow light, thou balmy air" (composed long before Mendelssohn wrote) has been an interesting work to have quoted, containing as it does so many passages anticipatory of Mendelssohn's manner. There is also a most remarkable passage in Bishop's glee, "Come forth, sweet spirit," which might be compared with a well-known passage in "Thanks be to God" in "Elijah," composed many years after Bishop's glee was in print. Bishop's glee is in F major, and the passage to which we refer runs thus—

Mr. Barrett advocates the formation of Societies for the performance of old English glees; but it seems to us that the great scarceness of male alto presents a difficulty at the present time. Perhaps the unpopularity of the male alto voice in recent years may in some degree account for the neglect of glee music. Certainly glees do not produce all the effect intended by the composer when the upper part is sung by a contralto. Space forbids further extracts from Mr. Barrett's book, but our readers will do well to obtain and peruse it for themselves; they will find that the information given covers a much wider field than might be supposed from the title "English Glees and Part-Songs"—the progress of the art of music from the earliest times is traced century by century—the music of the Hebrews, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, Troubadours, Ecclesiastics, and Seculars, indeed almost all branches of musical history are treated of. The work is a history of music, in which English glees and part-songs have perhaps for the first time received a proper and fair consideration.

Verdi: Histoire Anecdotique de sa vie et de ses œuvres. Par Arthur Pougin. [Paris: Calmann Lévy.]

THE precedent—a modern one we take it—of publishing biographies in the lifetimes of the men whom they describe, is one which, vitiis imitabile, has been responsible for a great many worthless productions. But fortunately there are exceptions to the rule, and the volume before us is a signal exception. M. Pougin, who is a distinguished critic as well as a charming writer, has here performed a difficult task with the utmost success. Never once quitting the "anecdotal frame" which he has traced out for himself, never deviating into unnecessary personalities, he has been scrupulous to let the adverse as well as the admiring critics of Verdi have an ample hearing in his pages, without, however, attempting to forestall the judgment of posterity by any deliberate verdict of his own. Judiciously conceived and carefully carried out in the best of taste, this life of Verdi—which we are glad to learn is destined ere long to see the light in an English dress—is one of the most agreeable books we have met with for a long time, combining entertainment and information in the happiest form. The son of a small innkeeper and grocer at Roncola, a little town at the foot of the Apennines, Verdi narrowly escaped death in the massacre of Italians by the invading forces of Austrians and Russians in the year 1814, when he was one year old, owing his life to the presence of mind of his mother, who took refuge in the belfry of the village church. His latent instinct for music was brought out by a vagabond fiddler, whom Verdi failed not to remember thirty years later, and found vent on the keyboard of an old spinet which he still possesses. After holding the post of village organist, and directing a Philharmonic Society at the neighbouring town of Busseto, we find him applying in his nineteenth year for admission to the Conservatoire at Milan and failing to satisfy his examiners. He studied accordingly as a private pupil under Lavigna, and on the death of Provesi, the leading musician of Busseto, succeeded him in most of his emoluments, though a certain section of the townsfolk, including the clergy, espoused the cause of a rival, Ferrari, with such zeal that the peace of the neighbourhood was seriously disturbed. Marrying early, he lost his wife and both children within the space of a few months, before he had completed his twenty-seventh year, and, prostrated by the shock, resolved to renounce the career of a composer for ever. This decision was, fortunately for the world, upset by the persistence of Merelli, the impresario of the Scala at Milan, and the tempting character of the libretto of "Nabucco" which he furnished him with. On March 9, 1842, "Nabucco" was performed, and Verdi launched on the floodtide of success, which never afterwards ran wholly dry. A special feature about this pleasant volume is that it clears up a good many disputed points—e.g., the date of Verdi's birth, his familiarity with Mozart's "Don Giovanni," &c. Where good stories abound so plentifully it is hard to make extracts. Under these circumstances it is fairer to the author to bid our readers consult the original for themselves, a piece of advice for which we can securely count upon the gratitude of all who take it.

I will magnify Thee, O God (Psalm 145). Composed by J. Maude Crament. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. CRAMENT's church compositions have often received favourable notice in THE MUSICAL TIMES, but the above is a more ambitious work than anything we have hitherto seen from his pen, and in saying that he has been equally successful we are according him no light praise. Structurally his setting of the 145th Psalm consists of nine numbers, of which five are choral. The style of the music is essentially broad, dignified, and church-like, never once descending to mere prettiness, though there is no lack of melody in the solo music. From this point of view the most attractive number is a soprano and tenor duet, "The Lord is high," but the most powerful writing is to be found in a baritone solo, "The Lord upholdeth." All the choruses contain evidence of the composer's skill in counterpoint and fugue, the most elaborate being No. 5, a five-part fugue coming to an imposing climax. Two excellent anthems could be made by dividing the work at this point, but it would also be effective performed in its entirety in the concert-room, for which purpose it has been scored for full orchestra.

The day is done. Part-Song. By George J. Halford. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THERE is so much of merit in this setting of some verses by Longfellow that we may point out how the composer has injured its chances of obtaining popularity. His music flows on with unceasing agreeable melody, but it is not divided into verses, and the absence of any repetition makes it appear formless and vague. Fortunately, the last few lines are the most attractive, so that the final impression is favourable.

Serenade in E flat, for Orchestra. Composed for the Philharmonic Society, by Thomas Wingham. Arranged as a Pianoforte Duet, by Ernest Kiver.

THIS Serenade, favourably noticed by us on its first performance at the Philharmonic Society last year, has been excellently arranged as a Pianoforte Duet by Mr. Kiver—so well, indeed, that those who have never heard it in its original form would scarcely suspect it to be a transcription. The graceful and refined poetical feeling displayed throughout the work—illustrative of Shakespeare's well-known lines, "How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank"—will certainly require most sympathetic playing upon the part of both executants (the charming "Scherzino" more especially); but the sterling worth of the music will amply repay any care bestowed upon its rendering. Players who wish to recall the orchestral effects will find many valuable indications of the score.

The Trinity College, London, Calendar for the Academical Year, 1886-87. [A. Hammond and Co.]

NOT only is every information concerning Trinity College to be found in this Calendar, but its contents include the Regulations for Degrees in Music at the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, London, and Ireland, and a list of Doctors and Bachelors in Music of the United Kingdom. Specimens of the Musical Examination Papers set for the last year at the College are also given, and will be found highly useful—so much so, indeed, that the authorities will, we are certain, thank us for pointing out that there is an error in the fourth chord given at page 271, which, as it stands, is not a discord at all; no doubt a natural before the B is intended.

Twelve Original Voluntaries for the Organ and Harmonium. By Oliver King. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MUSIC intended for the organ or harmonium is usually most suited to the latter instrument, as the pedal board may be regarded as one of the most distinctive features of the pipe organ. This may be said of the little pieces before us, though no directions for registering are given. Still, most of them will do very well as organ voluntaries for amateurs who have not yet commenced to "feel their feet." Mr. Oliver King writes like a sound musician, and his pieces are all noteworthy for purity of style and expressiveness, simple as they may be. The gems are No. 5, a Pastorale, and No. 10, an Impromptu, but everyone is more or less pleasing.

The Professional Pocket Book, and Daily and Hourly Engagement Diary for 1887. [Rudall, Carte and Co.]

WE observe no new features in the present issue of this Pocket-book; but all those which characterised the many which have preceded it are carefully preserved, and we may therefore again commend it to the notice of all professional men.

FOREIGN NOTES.

ON the 18th of this month, one hundred years will have elapsed since, at the little town of Eutin, in Holstein, Carl Maria von Weber, the world-famed composer of "Der Freischütz," of "Euryanthe," and of "Oberon," first saw the light. The occasion will be made one of festivities throughout the Fatherland, and it is to be hoped that in this country also the event will not be entirely passed over. Our readers need not be reminded that it was for England the master wrote his last great work "Oberon," the first performances of which, in 1826, at Covent Garden Theatre, he conducted with his dying hand; and that shortly afterwards, on the fifth of June of the same year, he expired at the house of the late Sir George Smart, in London. At the composer's native town active preparations have been for some time on foot for an appropriate celebration of the forthcoming centenary, although it is still doubtful whether this will include the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the projected monument for which subscriptions have been for some time solicited. Partly on account of the latter being as yet far from sufficient to defray the expenses of a worthy memorial, and partly also on account of the unseasonable time of year, the above ceremony will probably be postponed until next summer, when, it is to be hoped, the prospect for a speedy realisation of the entire scheme will likewise have brightened, and the stigma have been removed from the composer's countrymen that they so little honour one of their greatest musicians. We shall furnish a report of the commemorative performances in connection with the above centenary in our next number.

At the Vienna Hof-Theater a cycle of Weber's operas is announced to commence on the 5th inst. It will include the early opera "Abu Hassan," as well as "Freischütz," "Euryanthe," "Oberon," and the melodrama "Preciosa." A special performance of "Euryanthe" is to be given on the 18th inst. in commemoration of the jubilee of the composer's birth.

Weber's Cantata "Kampf und Sieg," composed in 1815 in commemoration of the Battle of Waterloo, and first produced in December of the same year at Prague, was revived on the 12th ult., at the second Concert of the Berlin Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Dr. Joachim. The performance was an excellent one, and the picturesqueness and dramatic fire of the composition aroused the enthusiasm of the hearers, and caused them to wonder why so noble a work by the great composer had been so long neglected.

Herr Nicolaus Oesterlein, a wealthy Viennese amateur, is about to establish in the Austrian capital a permanent Wagner Museum, which will comprise his own enormous collection of Wagneriana (books, pamphlets, manuscripts, portraits, prints, &c.), and to which, he hopes, other collectors will contribute their quota. The institution, which is to be open to all, is likely to furnish much valuable and interesting material to the student of what may be termed the Wagner epoch in the present century.

Count Hochberg, the new Director General of the Royal Theatres of Berlin, has issued an order to the artists of the opera enjoining them not to interrupt the action on the stage by advancing to the footlights to acknowledge the plaudits of the audience, and to accept recalls only at the conclusion of an act or of a tableau. A very sensible restriction this, and worthy of imitation!

The expenditure in connection with the Royal Theatres (opera and drama) of Berlin, during the past twelve months, has amounted to two and a half million marks. The Emperor's yearly contribution out of his privy purse is 450,000 marks; but in addition to this he also pays the deficit, which is generally very considerable, notwithstanding the fact that all the members of the Royal family have their boxes, for which they pay the due annual rent, and that for every performance "by command" of the Emperor, the latter pays the entire cost.

A most successful performance took place, on the 10th ult., at the Court Theatre of Dessau, of a new opera, entitled "Die Hochzeit des Mönchs" ("The Wedding of the Monk"), by Herr August Klughardt. Both the libretto (from the pen of Herr Pasque) and the music are most highly spoken of, and the work is likely to make the round of German operatic stages.

A new opera, "Otto der Schütz," by Victor Nessler (the composer of "The Piper of Hamelin"), was brought out on the 15th ult., at the Leipzig Stadt-Theatre, with some success. The work is, however, characterised in the German press as generally weak, and deficient in those popular qualities which have rendered preceding productions of this composer so attractive to the masses. At the same theatre, Nessler's "Der Trompeter von Säkkingen" (first produced here some two years ago), celebrated its one hundredth performance last month before a crowded audience, and in the presence of its fortunate composer.

Out of a total of 3,407 operatic performances given by twenty-nine of the more important German Theatres during the year 1885, no less than 526 were devoted to works by Richard Wagner.

A pianist of Riga, Herr Pohligh, proposes during the present winter to play, in the course of eight Recitals, the entire number of Beethoven's pianoforte sonatas.

The following are the more important works which will be performed during the present season by the Philharmonic Society, of Vienna—viz.: Overture (J. S. Bach, first time); Overture "Leonore," No. 1, and Symphonies, Nos. 1, 3, and 5 (Beethoven); Overture "Carneval" (Berlioz); Suite "L'Arlesienne" (Bizet); Symphony, No. 4, and Pianoforte Concerto B flat major (Brahms); Scherzo Capriccioso, and Symphony, No. 2 (Dvorák, first time);

Serenade, No. 4 (Fuchs); Symphony (Heuberger, first time); "Faust" Symphony (Liszt, first time); Overture "Ruler of the Spirits" (Weber); "Siegfried Idyl" (Wagner); Symphonies (Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann).

Spontini's now seldom heard chef-d'œuvre, "La Vestale," was revived, on the 7th ult., at the Hof-Theater of Brunswick.

"Donna Diana," a new opera by Heinrich Hofmann, was performed for the first time, on the 15th ult., at the Royal Opera of Berlin, and was well-received, special applause being bestowed upon some incidental vases (vocal), the "ballet" music generally, and a quartet for male voices. The orchestration is said to be throughout highly effective. The leading press organs do not, however, regard the new work of the gifted composer as likely to obtain a permanent hold upon the répertoire of the Royal Institution in question.

The sixty-fourth Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine is announced to take place in Whitsun-week next year, at Düsseldorf, the Conductors being Herr Julius Tausch, of that town, and Dr. Hans Richter.

A season of "Popular Concerts," in the place of the now defunct "Euterpe" Concerts, was inaugurated at Leipzig on the 1st ult., under the direction of Herr Hans Sitt. The Concert was very well attended.

The well-known pianist, Herr Franz Rummel, is just now giving a series of most successful Concerts of chamber music at Berlin, in conjunction with several artists from the Meyer'sche orchestra. The undertaking meets with the warm appreciation of Berlin amateurs, while serving to enhance the already brilliant reputation of the Concert-giver, whose performances, at this and other concert institutions of the German capital, are referred to in most eulogistic terms by the leading press organs. Herr Rummel is expected to arrive in this country in the course of next month.

At one of the Symphony Concerts, under direction of Herr Hlavatch, recently given at St. Petersburg, the third part of the programme was devoted to English composers, when orchestral numbers by Mr. Prout, Dr. Mackenzie, and Sir Arthur Sullivan obtained a hearing, and met with a most favourable reception.

Anton Rubinstein's new Symphony (in A minor) was performed for the first time in public at one of the recent Gewandhaus Concerts of Leipzig, under the direction of the composer, and was most enthusiastically received. The eminent pianist-composer has, it is stated, accepted an invitation to give a series of seven Concerts in Madrid and Barcelona in the early part of next year. As on recent similar occasions, the great artist will repeat each performance for the special benefit of brother musicians in the above towns, who will be present at his invitation. Rubinstein's opera, "The Demon," completed its hundred representations last month, at Moscow.

Georges Bizet's opera, "Les Pêcheurs de Perles," was produced, for the first time on any German stage, on the 10th ult., at the Stadt-Theater of Düsseldorf.

Recent performances of "The Mikado" at the Frankfurt Stadt-Theatre have proved as successful as were the previous productions of that specifically English operetta at Berlin and Vienna.

A grand celebration in honour of the late Franz Liszt is being prepared by the Symphony Society of Antwerp, on which occasion the symphonic poems "Orpheus" and "Tasso" will be performed. M. Alexandre Siloti will play the "Wanderer" Fantasia, and the "Danse macabre."

Liszt's Oratorio, "Christus," was performed last month at Munich, under the direction of the court capellmeister, Herr Levi, and produced a deep impression. Among the solo vocalists was Herr Heinrich Vogl, Professor Hieber presiding at the organ.

A laurel wreath, handsomely wrought in massive silver, has been placed upon the grave of Franz Liszt, at Bayreuth, the gift of the members of the Imperial orchestra of St. Petersburg.

Among the posthumous papers of Franz Liszt, has been found a complete "Pianoforte School," in three parts, the right of publication for which was acquired, it is stated, some years previous to the pianist-composer's death, by the firm of Schuberth, in Leipzig.

Albert Niemann, the veteran Wagner tenor, made his début last month before a New York audience in the part of Siegmund, in "Die Walküre," and met with a most enthusiastic reception.

At the University of Munich, a course of lectures has just been commenced by Dr. Muncker, on "The Dramatic Poems and Literary Writings of Richard Wagner," a fact which may be taken to indicate the growing appreciation amongst his countrymen of the important services rendered by the poet-composer in the field of national literature alone.

Several of Wagner's music dramas have lately been performed in Italy, notably at Rome and Florence ("Lohengrin") and at Turin ("Der fliegende Holländer").

M. Victor Wilder, the French translator of Wagner's book to "Die Meistersinger," has just completed a French version of "Tristan und Isolde."

At the projected Paris performance of "Lohengrin," early in next year, a translation of the text from the pen of M. Charles Nuyter (said to be an excellent one) is to be used. M. Lamoureux is already busily engaged upon the mounting of the work at the Eden Theatre, and the forthcoming première is looked forward to with intense interest in Paris musical circles.

Wagner's "Tannhäuser" is in course of being mounted at the Teatro Liceo of Barcelona.

Herr E. Kretschmer has just completed the score of a new opera entitled "Schön Rothraut," which will shortly be produced on several German operatic stages.

Professor G. Engel, the much esteemed musical critic of the Berlin Vossische Zeitung, has just celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his connection with that journal.

At the Paris Opéra Comique, rehearsals have commenced of M. Saint-Saëns's new Opera, entitled "Proserpine," for which MM. Vacquerie and Gallet have written the libretto. It will probably be brought out in January next.

A comic opera, the libretto whereof has been suggested by Lafontaine's well-known fable of "La Cigale et la Fourmi"; and which bears the same title, was successfully brought out last month at the Gaieté Theatre of Paris. The music, which is said to contain many popular numbers, is by M. Audran, the composer of "La Mascotte."

The French Academy of Fine Arts has elected the Maestro Sgambati, of Rome, to a corresponding membership, in the room of his late friend and master, Franz Liszt.

It is said that M. Gounod, at the request of Pope Leo XIII., will spend some time at Rome during the present winter for the purpose of setting to music a number of hymns whereof the holy father is the author.

There were no less than 220 female candidates for admission to the pianoforte classes of the Paris Conservatoire this year, out of which number thirteen only were admitted to the advanced sections, and seventeen to the elementary classes.

The following are the more important works performed at the leading Concert institutions of Paris during the past month—viz., Châtelet Concerts: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Symphonie Fantastique, "Oraison Funèbre," from "Symphonie Funèbre et Triomphale" (Berlioz); Overture "Coriolanus," Ballet music, "Prometheus," Symphony in F (Beethoven); Overture "Patrie," "Jeux d'enfants," Orchestral Suite "Roma" (Bizet); Violin Concerto (Bruch); "Ride of the Valkyries" (Wagner). Lamoureux Concerts: Symphony, D minor (Schumann); Overture, "Frances-Juges" (Berlioz); Prelude, "Tristan und Isolde" (Wagner); Overture, "Euryanthe" (Weber); Pianoforte Concerto, E flat (Beethoven); "Marche des Pèlerins" (Berlioz); Minuet for strings (Handel); Rhapsodie Norvégienne (E. Lalo); "Siegfried Idyl" (Wagner). Concerts Populaires: Symphony, C minor (Beethoven); Symphony, D major (Mozart); fragments from "Die Meistersinger" (Wagner).

In No. 48 of the Paris Le Ménestrel is published the paper on "La Nature et L'Art," recently read by M. Gounod in the French Académie, and referred to in our last number.

At Madrid, a new operetta entitled "Jugar con fuego" was recently brought out with conspicuous success. The composer is the Maestro Ventura de la Vega y Barbieri.

Liszt's Oratorio "Christus" will shortly be performed, for the first time in the United States, by the Oratorio Society of New York.

The committee charged with the organisation of the festivities in connection with the forthcoming Papal Jubilee at Rome, has offered a prize for the composition of a hymn (in the Italian language) commemorative of the event. The successful competitor will be the recipient of a gold medal, bearing the image of Leo XIII., and the sum of 250 lire.

The libretto of the successful new opera "Flora Mirabilis," by the Maestro Samara, is being translated into German, with a view to the production of the work at a leading operatic stage in Germany.

An opera entitled "Edmea," by the young Maestro Catalani, recently brought out with much success at Milan, has met with equal favour on its production last month also at Turin.

At a recent performance of Verdi's "Aida," at Budapest, the interpreters of the three leading characters sang their parts in as many different languages—viz., Italian, Polish, and Hungarian respectively; a veritable confusion of tongues, more especially in the concerted numbers!

A new operetta by Herr Zeller, entitled "Der Vagabund," was brought out at the Carl-Theater of Vienna last month, where it met with a most enthusiastic reception.

According to La Riforma, of Rome, the Maestro Verdi has given strict injunctions to his publishers to withhold the right of performance of his new opera "Otello" from any operatic stage where the diapason normal has not been adopted in the orchestra. Meanwhile, the long looked-for production, on any stage, of the veteran Maestro's new work, appears to be still a matter of uncertainty.

We have been requested to state that Mr. Lacey Baker, late Organist and Choirmaster at St. Paul's (American) Church, in Rome, has been nominated an Associate of the Royal Academy of Santa Cecilia of that capital.

M. Adolphe Jullien, the well known French musical savant, has just published an elaborate and copiously illustrated Life of Richard Wagner. The following passage, quoted by a contemporary from the work, may serve to show the author's appreciation of the Bayreuth master:—"Those who saw him as he was, sometimes indulging in unrestrained gaiety, now pouring out a torrent of jokes and laughter, anon furious, not respecting in his attacks either titles, authorities, or friendships, always obeying the irresistible élan of the first impulse, could not too severely reproach him for his lack of taste, the want of tact and delicacy of which he was guilty; if a Jew, one was tempted to forgive him for his pamphlet on 'The Judaism in Music'; if one was French, to pardon him for his buffoonery upon the capitulation of Paris; if a German, to overlook the insults he heaped upon the land of the Teuton; just as we forgive Voltaire for 'La Pucelle,' Shakespeare for certain plaisanteries and sonnets, Goethe for some ridiculous pieces, and Victor Hugo for some speeches. We take Wagner for what he was, full of defects—perhaps, because he was full of genius, undoubtedly a superior man, one of the greatest and most extraordinary beings that the century has produced."

Under the title of "L'opéra et le Drame musical d'après l'œuvre de Wagner," another volume relative to the Bayreuth reformer has just been issued in Paris, the author being M^{me}. Henriette Fuchs. The work is prefaced by a letter written by M. Sully-Prudhomme, a member of the French Académie.

Dr. Langhans's important new work, "The History of Music in the 17th, 18th, and 19th centuries" (Leipzig: F. E. C. Leuckart, 2 vols.), has just been completed, and will shortly be reviewed in this journal.

Under the chief editorship of M. Edouard Dujardin, a new monthly journal, devoted to literature and the arts, has been founded in the French capital, entitled La Revue Indépendante.

The Wiener Signale, a Viennese music journal occasionally quoted by us, has ceased to appear.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph writes to that journal under date the 16th ult: "M. Jouvin, whose musical criticisms were at one time read as eagerly as the feuilletons of his more famous contemporaries, Jules Janin, Théophile Gautier, and Paul de Saint Victor, has just died at the age of seventy-six. His articles in the Figaro, written with much acumen, and in a quaint style, somewhat like that of Chorley, the critic of the Athenaeum, were always signed 'Benedict.' He was the son-in-law of M. Villemessant, the founder of the journal."

At Broni (Italy), died, at the age of forty-nine, Cesare Casiraghi, a popular composer of ballets and operettas, the librettos of some of the latter having been written in the Milanese dialect.

The death is announced, last month, at Dresden, of the widow of Conradin Kreutzer, the composer of "Das Nachtlager in Granada," whom she has survived by nearly forty years.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GIESECKE; AND THE ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The statement in THE MUSICAL TIMES of November 1, that Giesecke, the reputed author of the libretto of Mozart's "Zauberflöte," subsequently became Professor of Natural History in Dublin, is quite correct. He was Professor of Natural History in the Royal Dublin Society for many years. Doctor George Hatchell, State Physician in the household of His Excellency the Viceroy of Ireland, tells us that Charles Giesecke (pronounced here Giesëcke) lectured on mineralogy in the year 1826. There is a catalogue of minerals, forming the collection of the Society, made by him in the year 1832. Doctor Hatchell attended his lectures, and remembers the somewhat strange-looking little man very well. To come to a more modern musician, he also recollects attending a dancing academy kept by the father of Michael Balfe, in a street near Merriem Square, Dublin. It was the custom to have a violin-player to play for the pupils while learning, and in this instance the violinist was Michael Balfe, a bright-eyed, light-haired little boy. He was in future days the eminent composer. It is interesting to be thus brought, as it were, into converse with one who was acquainted with the greatest musician that ever lived, and also with a composer who, occupying a far humbler niche in the temple of Art, still shares with the great master the admiration and affection of all lovers of music.

Allow me to make a few remarks on the letter in THE MUSICAL TIMES complaining of the inefficiency of the Royal Irish Academy of Music. Considering that the writer was for many years Professor of Singing in the Academy, and that the classes are pretty much on the basis framed by him, the complaint is, at least, ungenerous. No one is better aware than the writer of the letter of the early struggles of the Academy for existence, and that the observation of a friendly critic would rather be the wonder how it has existed and prospered at all, than that it should be deficient in some branches of musical education entailing additional expense.

The charges against the management of the Academy were made pending the allocation of the Coulson Fund. They have long since been refuted and publicly withdrawn by their promoters. The administration of the Coulson Fund through the Academy was resolved on by the Corporation of Dublin, and subsequently sanctioned by a decree of the Court of Chancery.

The alterations in the management of the Institution are few and unimportant, and were considered necessary to give legal validity to the application of the fund.

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

J. W. BRADY,

Hon. Sec., Royal Irish Academy of Music.

November 12, 1886.

P.S.—Since writing the above I learn that Charles Giesecke was knighted, and an admirable oil portrait, by Raeburn, of Sir Charles Giesecke, hangs on the walls of the Royal Dublin Society.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—There is one paragraph of the letter appearing on the above subject in your November number which, as it concerns the musical Society of which I am the founder and Conductor, I trust that you will permit me to answer. It reads as follows: "I may mention that there is also an Orchestral Union in Dublin, but I do not think it has been much of a success." Allow me to give an unqualified contradiction to this statement for the following reasons:—The Orchestral Union, a combination of local professional and amateur elements, never was in such a prosperous condition, artistically and financially, as it happens to be at the end of this, its seventh, season. Any person acquainted with the difficulty of founding an Orchestral Society will know that it takes considerable time to bring a band to a state of efficiency; but from the incentive given to the amateurs to study, and the assistance I have received from the members of the musical profession, we are now in a position to perform such works as the earlier of the Symphonies of Beethoven, the Mendelssohn Concertos, the standard Overtures, &c.

The committee are thoroughly satisfied with the successes that have been gained, and with the result of their efforts to remove the imputation that "Dublin does not possess an orchestra," towards which end they are at length within measurable distance.

I may, in conclusion, be permitted to call attention to the fact that "Hibernicus" has bestowed warm approval upon one of the musical Societies of our metropolis which, as a matter of fact, has not shown any sign of vitality for the past twelve months.

I am, yours faithfully,

W. H. TELFORD.

THE ORGANIST AT THE FIRST PERFORMANCE OF "ELIJAH."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In the obituary notice of James Stimpson in your current issue, you, in common with other biographers (including Sir George Grove in vol. iv., p. 46, of his Dictionary), are in error. Allow me to say that Mr. Stimpson did not play the organ at the production of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" at Birmingham in 1846. The organist on that memorable occasion was the late Dr. Gauntlett. Confirmation of this can be found by referring to a letter from Mr. Stimpson in The Lute of February 15, 1883, p. 46, where, speaking of the first performance of "Elijah," he says, "he (Dr. Gauntlett) played from an organ part only, and I 'turned over' for him." Such authoritative evidence is conclusive.—Yours faithfully,

F. G. EDWARDS.

EMPLOYMENT OF FEMALE VOICES IN CHURCH CHOIRS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Why should not women's voices be used more extensively in church singing, even where there are surplined choirs? In nearly all churches where there is a chancel screen, one or two rows of women could be placed behind the surplined choir where they would not be obtrusively visible. I suppose there is no doubt that women's voices are far superior to boys' in richness, sweetness, and purity of intonation. I know one church in London where this plan is carried out with a very good result, and I should be glad to hear of any others where this practice prevails.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

AMBERGAVENNY.—The Orchestral Society gave its first Concert at the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 4th ult, under distinguished patronage. The principal singers were Mrs. G. Howell (née Bishop), Miss Agnes Morgan, Mr. Walter N. Phillips, and Mr. William Jones (William How). The Society was formerly known as the Abergavenny Amateur String Band, and early in the present year a change of Conductorship was deemed advisable, when the bâton was placed in the hand of Mr. C. C. Caird, a resident local professor, under whom a great improvement has been effected. The selections included Mendelssohn's Cornelius March, Czibulka's "Stephanie Gavotte," Beethoven's Overture to La Mémoriale, Liszt's Marche des Dragons, the Bohemian Girl, and a selection from the opera of Patience, in all of which the orchestra was highly efficient.

ABERYSTWYTH.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at Trinity Church, on Friday, October 29. The music comprised Venite in A, Savage; Te Deum and Benedictus, Gregorian Tones, arranged by Dr. Stainer (third series); Anthem, "O give thanks unto the Lord," Sir G. Elvey; Kyrie in G, Gounod; and Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Gregorian Tones, arranged by Dr. Stainer (third series). The services were excellently rendered by the choir, under the direction of Mr. Richard James, Choirmaster. Mrs. A. J. Hughes presided at the harmonium with much ability.

ALFORD.—In aid of the Recreation Ground Fund, an amateur Concert was given in the Corn Exchange, on October 28, which was well attended. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Northie, Mrs. Kell, Miss Johnson, Messrs. Reed, Kell, Whipham, H. Coney, and the Rev. G. S. Tyack. The Excelsior Band played two selections with much success, and the Concert concluded with the National Anthem.

AMBERGATE.—On Monday, the 8th ult, a Concert was given before a large audience. The vocalists were Miss Hearden, Miss Jessop, Miss Summerside, Mr. Hague, and Mr. Edson (of Manchester); Miss Curzon, solo violin. Part-songs were excellently rendered under the Conductorship of Mr. Walter W. Windle, Organist of Belper Church, who accompanied throughout, and played pianoforte duets with his pupils, Miss Lee and Miss Golightly.

ASHTON.—At the Wesleyan Chapel, Stamford Street, on the 10th ult., Mr. J. Buckley Thompson gave an Organ Recital before a large congregation. The performer rendered a programme selected from the works of the standard composers with skill and skill, considering that he is quite blind, and consequently plays entirely from memory, was indeed a remarkable feat, and created a marked effect upon his hearers. Madame Farrar-Hyde contributed several songs, which were deservedly received with much favour, one being warmly re-demanded.

BARNARD CASTLE.—The Hymn of Praise and Cowen's Rose Maiden were performed on the 12th ult., by the Sacred Harmonic Society. The artists engaged were Miss Winnie Beaumont, Miss Helen Lee, Mr. G. H. Welch, and Mr. Hopkinson. There was a band of about 100, Mr. W. Raper conducting. The soloists acquitted themselves to the entire satisfaction of the audience, the important part of the Rose Maiden being excellently sung by Miss Beaumont.

BELFAST.—The first Subscription Chamber Concert of the season in connection with the Belfast Philharmonic Society, took place on the 5th ult., in the Ulster Minor Hall. The celebrated Heckmann Quartet had been engaged for the occasion, and their splendid performance of some of the most characteristic works of the great composers, furnished a rich treat to the subscribers and their friends. The programme also included Beethoven's Sonata in G, for pianoforte and violin, excellently played from memory by Herren Beyschlag and Heckmann. The vocalist was Mr. Benson. The first Subscription Concert of the season was given by the members of the Philharmonic Society on the 12th ult., in the Ulster Hall. The solo vocalists were Miss Robertson, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Orlando Harley, and Signor Foli; Signor Bottesini, solo contra basso; Signor Papini, solo violin; Miss Marie Olson, solo pianoforte; and Mr. Sidney Naylor, Conductor and accompanist. The programme was miscellaneous, and included Mozart's Overture "Thou, Lord, art merciful," and Haydn's Motet, "Distracted with care and anguish," both these selections being admirably rendered. The choir, under the skilful direction of Herr Beyschlag, who was enthusiastically received. The Concert was one of the most successful ever given by the Society.

BODMIN.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held in the old Cathedral Church on the 16th ult. The Te Deum was sung to Sullivan in D; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis to Dykes in F. The chief feature in the service was the excellent rendering of the Anthem "It came even to pass" (Ouseley), which exhibited the capabilities of the choir, the resources of the organ, and the ability of the organist. The solo voice was taken by Messrs. Middle and S. Rowe, Mr. Skinner and W. Rowe. An excellent Recital was given on the fine three-manual organ by the Organist and Choir Director, Mr. C. E. Juleff, F.S.Sc.

BOLTON.—There has been quite an agreeable variety of Concerts in the town during the month. On the 3rd ult., Miss Wild and Mr. Pimblett were the principal vocalists at a meeting promoted by the local Art Club. On the evening of the 6th, popular Concerts were given in the Town Hall and the Temperance Hall (the former conducted by Mr. Mullineux, the Borough Organist, and in which the Broughton Church Choir took part). On the 17th, Miss Robertson, Madame Sterling, Mr. O. Harley, and Signor Foli were the vocalists at a Grand Concert, and Miss Marie Olson, Signor Papini, and Signor Bottesini the instrumentalists. Mr. Charles Hallé, Signor Risegari, M. Vieuxtemps, Herr Bernhardt, M. Brossa, and Mr. R. Johnson gave a Chamber Concert in the Town Hall, on the 20th ult.—A Concert was given in the Temperance Hall, on the 6th ult., under the auspices of the young men in connection with Halliwell Road Wesleyan Sunday School. The principal vocalists were Miss Bessie Holt, R.A.M., Mr. Edmund Badger, Mr. H. Taylor, and the Eagle Choir Society, conducted by Mr. H. Greg; solo violin, Herr Driessen; accompanist, Mr. R. Fryer. Miss Holt was highly successful in all her songs; Mr. Taylor was warmly and deservedly applauded, and Mr. Badger displayed an excellent tenor voice in both his solos. There was an efficient orchestra, led by Mr. Crompton, and conducted by Mr. A. Morris.

BRADFORD.—A successful Organ Recital was given in St. Mary Magdalen Church, on Monday evening, the 8th ult., by Mr. Arthur Ingham, Organist of the Church. The programme included selections from the works of Guilmant, Widor, Morandi, Hopkins, and Mendelssohn, all of which were well rendered.

CARLETON, MON.—Mrs. Alfred Morris, L.R.A.M., held her annual Students' Concert at the Lesser Park Hall, on Monday, the 1st ult. The programme, which was well rendered, included pianoforte solos, duets, part-songs, &c. The students, as usual, evinced marks of careful training, attacking the choruses with precision. Mr. A. Morris ably conducted.

CHATHAM.—The Congregational Church having been repaired and decorated, and a new three-manual organ erected therein, a series of Concerts and Organ Recitals has been given at which several London organists and vocalists have been engaged. On Wednesday evening, October 27, Dr. C. J. Frost was organist, and Madame Clara West and Miss Lottie West were the vocalists. On Wednesday, the 17th ult., a Concert was given at the Ebenezer Congregational Church in aid of the Restoration Fund. Dr. Charles W. Pearce gave several organ solos in a masterly manner. The vocalists were Miss Kate Winter and Miss Josephine Harter. The Mendelssohn Quartet, consisting of Messrs. Henri Rivière, Fred Banhof, George Curtis, and Charles Bernard, gave four quartets during the evening, and were deservedly well received; their rendering of Gounod's "O Lamb of God" and "As the hart pants," being particularly fine. Mr. T. R. Douse accompanied the vocal soloists.

CHICHESTER.—Mr. Seymour Kelly's seventh annual Concert took place on the 4th ult. The following artists were engaged:—Madame Adeline Paget, Madame Agnes Pettit, Mr. J. H. Hart, Mr. Joseph Heald, and Mr. Farley Sims. Solo pianist, Miss Marie Olson; solo violinist, Signor Papini; Conductor, Mr. F. Abernethy, F.C.O.

COVENTRY.—On Tuesday evening, the 10th ult., the first of a series of Organ Recitals was given in St. John's Church, by the Organist, Mr. G. J. Robertson, F.C.O. The programme was selected from the works of Handel, Bach, Mozart, Chauvet, Batiste, Sullivan, Weily, and Gounod. There was a large attendance, and the various pieces were played in excellent style.

DINGWALL.—A successful Concert was given in the Masonic Hall, on the evening of Friday, the 10th ult., by the choir of the Northern Counties' Institute for the Blind. Sir Kenneth Mackenzie, Lord-Lieutenant of the county, presided, supported by Provost Ross and Mr. Dewar. The programme comprised part-songs by Mendelssohn, Weber, &c., with some Gaelic airs and choruses, all of which were highly appreciated by a large audience. Miss Ross accompanied on the pianoforte, and by request, played at the close, a Valse by Chopin.

EASTRY, SANDWICH.—Selections from the works of Handel, Beethoven, Costa, Sterndale Bennett, Schumann, Stainer, and other well known authors, were performed in the Parish Church, on Friday afternoon, the 12th ult., by a select choir. The principal solos were well rendered by Miss Holday and the Rev. F. Savage. The Quartets, "God is a Spirit" (Bennett) unaccompanied, and "O come every one that thirsteth," from Elijah, were excellently sung by the Misses Rae, Mr. A. Yarrow, and the Rev. F. Savage. The choruses were also given with precision and good effect. Mrs. Rae and Mrs. Leggett were efficient accompanists. The Offertory started by over 50, and was devoted to the fund for warming and lighting the church during the winter.

HARROW GREEN.—A Concert was given on Tuesday, the 2nd ult., Mr. H. B. Andrews being the Conductor, and also playing two pianoforte solos of his own composition. Miss Adela Duckham, a student at the Guildhall School of Music, gave two violin solos in a very skilful manner, and was much applauded. The other artists were the Misses Standridge, Miss Guillermo, Miss J. Holden, Mrs. Wells, and Messrs. Barter, Steele, Bridge, Maddis, and Wells.

HEAGE, DERBYSHIRE.—At the Harvest Festival recently held in the church, an Organ Recital was given before the service by Mr. Walter W. Winder, Organist of Belper Parish Church, who played works from Handel, Lemmens, Batiste, &c., and a March of his own. The choir, trained by Mr. Winder, sang Goss in A, and "O Lord how manifold."

HEREFORD.—The lay Vicars' annual Concert, which took place in the Shire Hall, on the 4th ult., was attended by a large audience, and was patronised by the Bishop, clergy, and gentry of the neighbourhood. Besides glees by the Cathedral lay vicars, solos were sung by Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. R. Grice, and Mr. T. Kemp, all of whom were exceedingly well received; and the eminent violinist, Mr. Carrodue, contributed three solos with considerable effect.

HOBART.—A full Choral Service was held at St. John's Church, New Town, on Tuesday, September 14, in connection with the dedication of the new organ, built by Messrs. Hill & Co. (London). Mr. J. J. Hardman, the Organist, displayed the excellent qualities of the instrument to the greatest advantage. The Anthem, taken from Mozart's Twelfth Mass, was well rendered. The sermon was preached by the Bishop.

HOLLINWOOD.—On Sunday, October 31, Farmer's Mass in B flat was rendered by the choir at Corpus Christi Church in a highly creditable manner. "O Jesu Pastor" (Winter) was well sung as an Offertorium, and at Vespers, Novello's arrangement of "Ave Maria" was given. Mr. J. Greaves was the Organist, and Mr. J. Ross conducted.

HULL.—Under the auspices of the Church of England Sunday School Association, the teachers' annual Entertainment was held in St. Paul's Mission Hall, on the 15th ult. An Organ Recital was given in St.

Paul's Church by Mr. W. T. Marshall, several addresses were delivered, and a well-selected programme of sacred music was excellently rendered.

ILFORD.—The Vocal Union gave its third Concert in the Reading Room on the 18th ult., the chief item of the programme being A. R. Gaul's sacred Cantata The Holy City, which was warmly received. The accompaniments were performed by a small orchestra of the usual stringed and wood-wind instruments, pianoforte, and harp. The principal vocalists were Miss K. Nicholls, Miss Ross, Dafforne, R.A.M., Mr. T. P. S. de Jastrzebski, and Mr. E. Storr. The choral portions were very satisfactorily performed, the two unaccompanied choruses ("For God so loved the world" and "The fining pot is for silver") and the double chorus ("Let the heavens rejoice") being especially deserving of mention. Miss Nicholls, Miss Dafforne, and Mr. de Jastrzebski, in addition to taking the principal parts in the Cantata, also contributed songs in the second part with much success. The hall was crowded. Mr. Alfred Storr conducted.

ILKLEY.—The first of the six Subscription Concerts of the Vocal Society, was given at the Congregational Lecture Hall, on October 25. The artists were Madame Henrietta Tomlinson (vocalist), Herr Otto Bernhardt (first violin), M. Speelman (second violin), Herr Hunne-man (viola), Mr. H. Smith (violinello), and Conductor, Mr. S. Midgley, who presided at the pianoforte. All the instrumental selections, especially Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, and Haydn's Variations on the "Hymn to the Emperor," won warm and well deserved applause, and Madame Tomlinson's vocal pieces were thoroughly appreciated and cordially received.

LANCASTER.—The performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's Martyr of Antioch, by the Choral Society, on the 19th ult., attracted a large audience. The principal parts were excellently sung by Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Holberry Hagyard, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnall. The picturesque solo and chorus "Io Pagan," admirably sung by Miss Dones and the Choir, were redemanded; and Mrs. Hutchinson, in the Martyr's final song, made a profound impression. The band was selected from Mr. Halle's orchestra, and Mr. Dean officiated as Conductor.

LEAMINGTON.—During the week ending on the 6th ult., the Dedication Festival was observed at the Parish Church, which was beautifully decorated for the occasion. On the Monday, Mr. Frank Spinney gave an Organ Recital, and Wednesday was set apart as a special day for the choir, the choristers numbering over 300. The Processional Hymn, "The Church is Built on the Rock," written by Mr. Frank Spinney, was given with much effect. An excellent sermon, advocating the powerful influence of music, was preached by the Rev. E. Husband. Mr. Spinney ably presided at the organ during the Festival week. The fifth Orchestral Concert, in connection with the Musical Society, was given in the Theatre Royal on Saturday, October 30. The Symphony was Beethoven's No. 8, in F, of which the orchestra gave an excellent reading. Mr. Carodus played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and also his arrangement of Scotch melodies. The Hon. Mrs. R. H. Lyttelton was the vocalist. The band also played Auber's Overture to "Zanetta," and a Pizzicato movement by Lange, "The Mandolin." Mr. Frank Spinney conducted.

LINCOLN.—Mr. Barracough's forty-second Concert took place in the Masonic Hall, on the 5th ult., before an enthusiastic audience. The artists were Miss Robertson, Miss Agnes Janzen, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Orlando Harle, and Signor Goli vocalists; Signor Bottesini (contra-basso), and Signor Papini (violinist); solo pianoforte, Miss Marie Olson; Conductor, Mr. Sydney Naylor.

LANELEY.—At the Dedication Festival at All Saints' Church, on All Saints' Day, the Anthem was "What are these" (Stainer), and on Sunday and the concluding Service, "Hear my Prayer" (Mendelssohn). The debt has been cleared during the Festival. The Services were under the direction of Mr. Arthur W. Swindell, Organist and Choirmaster.

LONDONDERRY.—On October 29, the choir and congregation of St. Augustine's Church entertained their Organist, Mr. Wilby, at a social meeting, in order to take leave of him previous to his departure for Portrush. The chair was taken by the rector, the Rev. J. P. Tegar, and after a Concert performed by the choir of the church, Mr. Wilby was presented with a gold watch, as a token of the high appreciation of his services during his long connection with the Church.

LOUGHBOROUGH.—Mr. J. Addison Adcock's third annual Concert was given in the Town Hall, on the 1st ult., before a large audience. Mrs. Mason, R.A.M., and Mr. Alfred Page were the vocalists; solo zither, Mr. J. V. Woodward; cornet, Mr. W. W. Waddington; trombone, Mr. J. Branton. The Leicester Amateur Musical Union, comprising Mr. W. Rowlett; cello, Mr. F. Rowlett; Mr. W. T. A. Wykes; and pianoforte, Mr. H. B. Ellis, F.C.O., contributed operatic selections from Der Freischütz and The Mikado, specially arranged by Mr. T. Albykes. Mr. Adcock's Amateur Band of fifty performers also added much to the interest of the Concert by their excellent rendering of several orchestral pieces.

LOUTH.—A Concert, in aid of the Parish Church School Funds, was given in the Town Hall, on the 11th ult. The programme contained an excellent selection of songs, madrigals, and vocal and instrumental quartets. The vocalists were Miss Dora Woodville, Miss E. K. Colam, Mr. G. H. Gregory, Mus.Bac, Oxon., and Mr. C. B. King. A band of sixteen ladies and gentlemen played an Overture and part of a Symphony. Mr. G. H. Porter, Organist of the Parish Church, was the accompanist and director.

MANCHESTER.—The second Concert of the fifty-third session of the Gentlemen's Glee Club was given at the Albion Hotel, on the 2nd ult., Mr. R. A. Armistage being the president for the evening, and Mr. Frevilier and the Rev. T. Taylor-Evans the vice-presidents. The high character of which the choir of the Glee Club has so long enjoyed was fully maintained, and the singing of the various madrigals, glees, and part-songs elicited the warmest applause. The vocalists were Miss Conway, Miss Jessie Moorhouse, Miss Maria Watson, Miss Louisa Bowman, Miss Alice Walker, Miss Maud Yates, Messrs. Marriott, Kendal Thompson, N. Dumville, J. Grimshaw, J. Whittaker, audience. An important feature in the programme was the violin playing of Mr. Thompson, and praise must also be awarded for the excellent singing of the choir (under the able direction of Mr. E. H. Smith), an unaccompanied part-song, by Mendelssohn, being especially worthy of praise. At the close of the Concert, Major Board thanked the performers for their services, and paid a high compliment to Mr. E. H. Smith, who since he had become Organist of the Church had done very much towards improving the music.

WHITTINGTON MOOR.—Mr. T. Cooper gave his eighteenth annual Concert on the 1st ult., in the Congregational Church. The vocalists were Miss Annie Sewell, Miss Clara Cooper, Miss Lucretia Cooper, Master Lowell Cooper, Mr. H. Cooper, Mr. Thos. Cooper, and the Newell Unionists. Mr. Arthur Cooke presided at the pianoforte, and the Chesterfield Volunteer Prize Band was in attendance.

WOOLWICH.—An evening Concert was given in the Royal Assembly Rooms, on the 11th ult. The vocalists were Madame Clara West, Mr. Evan Jones, R.A.M., and Mr. J. Fitzgerald; instrumentalists, Miss Aida Fuller (violin), Mr. Barrett (fute), Mr. W. T. Barker (harp), and Miss K. T. Jones (pianoforte). One of the features of the evening was Madame West's rendering of Bishop's song "Lo, here the gentle lark," with flute obbligato.

THE "CONCERT" AND "PROFESSOR" VIOLINS.

MESSRS. RIVIERE and HAWKES beg to inform Professors of the Violin, and Players generally, that they have made an arrangement with one of the best French Violin Makers to manufacture, for them specially, two New Styles of Violin, to be named as above. Messrs. RIVIERE and HAWKES believe that they are supplying a long-felt want in introducing these Instruments to the Musical Public, for, up to the present, it has been almost impossible to buy a really good and carefully-made Instrument suitable for Orchestral and Solo Playing at a moderate price; those in the market being mostly cheap French or German copies, roughly made, and of no real value. The Instruments we now bring forward are carefully made by experienced workmen, some of whom have gained their knowledge in the workshop of the celebrated maker, J. B. VUILLAUME. This will at once establish the fact that these instruments are worthy of attention.

They are carefully made on the lines of the great Italian makers, and there is no doubt that they will increase in value if care and attention is bestowed on them. In appearance they are quite new, and remarkably handsome, a new Oil Varnish, which the maker has invented, being exclusively used on these Instruments.

THE "PROFESSOR" VIOLIN.

Suitable for Teaching and Orchestral Playing.
 Picked Wood, Oil Varnish ... £2 2 0
 Superior, fine Oil Varnish, and specially selected Wood and Fittings ... £3 3 0

THE "CONCERT" VIOLIN.

Specially made by the most skilled Workmen, and eminently suitable for Solo Playing.

Picked Wood, Oil Varnish ... £4 4 0
 Superior, fine Oil Varnish, and specially selected Wood and Fittings ... £6 6 0

To an Artist or Soloist requiring a really perfect Instrument, nothing better can be bought than this Violin, and we have every confidence in recommending it. To Players residing in the country, or in the Colonies, this is specially recommended, as being the only way in which they can secure a perfect Instrument and really good value for their money.

Orders from the Colonies will receive special attention, and every care will be taken in their execution.

PROGRESSIVE SIGHT-SINGING, for the use of Singing-Classes, Choirmasters, &c. By ROBERT MACHARDY. An easy systematic course of instruction for teaching to read Music at Sight in a few lessons. A large reduction for quantities.

NEW WORK.

ARRANGEMENTS for the Organ. By W. J. WESTBROOK, Mus. Doc. This work has been designed to meet the wants of those Organists who have to play organs more or less incomplete. The whole of the pieces may be played, therefore, upon organs with two keyboards; many of them, by a little management, upon organs with only one. The pedal is, of course, indispensable. It has been the aim to make all the pieces thoroughly playable, and as easy as was consistent with their due effect.

Nos. 1 to 14 now ready.

LITTLE BO-PEEP. Humorous Part-Song for Four Voices. By HARRY DANCEY. Price 3d. "There is much feeling for the humour of the words displayed throughout this song, the treatment of the phrase, 'When she awoke she found it a joke,' especially, being extremely effective. If well sung this little composition could not fail to be warmly received."—Musical Times.

SAINT LUDMILA

AN ORATORIO

JAROSLAV VRCHLICKÝ

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

ANTONÍN DVOŘÁK.

(OP. 71.)

	s.	d.
Vocal Score, Octavo, paper cover	5	0
" " paper boards	6	0

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"St. Ludmila" became a popular favourite immediately. It was a case, as between the audience and the music, of love at first sight. Number after number elicited enthusiastic applause, and the composer-conductor, received with cheers on taking his place, left it the hero of a triumph.

DAILY NEWS.

The applause at the end was as great as that showered down when the first part concluded; and after acknowledging the plaudits, Dvořák had again to return, led on this time by Sir Arthur Sullivan. Clearly then, no work could have had a more flattering verdict passed upon it at a first hearing.

LEEDS MERCURY.

LONDON & NEW YORK: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

PRODUCED AT THE LEEDS FESTIVAL, 1886.

THE

ADAPTED FROM THE POEM OF LONGFELLOW

BY

JOSEPH BENNETT

ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

Vocal Score, Octavo, paper cover	3	6
" " paper boards	4	0
" " cloth, gilt	5	0

THE TIMES.

"The Golden Legend" roused genuine enthusiasm. It is pleasant for the critic to be for once in full accord with the vox populi.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

A greater, more legitimate, and more undoubted triumph than that of the new Cantata has not been achieved within my experience.

STANDARD.

In speaking of the music which Sir Arthur Sullivan has added to Mr. Bennett's admirable libretto, I have nothing but praise—and praise the most emphatic—to offer. From first to last the hand of the master is apparent; and the united musical forces, instrumental and vocal, have been turned to a proper account.

ATHENÆUM.

Not one of his earlier Cantatas can compare with "The Golden Legend" in abstract beauty or even in finish of workmanship. This is high praise, but we bestow it without the slightest hesitation.

LONDON & NEW YORK: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

PRODUCED AT THE LEEDS FESTIVAL, 1886.

THE

STORY OF SAYID

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

JOSEPH BENNETT

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

Vocal Score, Octavo, paper cover	3	0
" " paper boards	3	6
" " cloth, gilt	4	6

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

In point of dramatic force and suggestiveness few examples of modern art are stronger than "The Story of Sayid."

STANDARD.

"The Story of Sayid" takes immediate rank as an art work of the very highest class.

MORNING POST.

ATHENÆUM.

As Sayid does not return, the Princess, who has offered herself as his hostage, has to prepare for death, and this gives occasion for a solemn march, which is one of the best things of its kind we have met with for some time. It is no easy matter to write an original march, joyous or funeral; but Mr. Mackenzie has succeeded in the task, and he has scored it in a masterly way.

THE GLOBE.

"The Story of Sayid" not merely adds to the already high reputation of its composer, but does honour to native art.

PRODUCED AT THE LEEDS FESTIVAL, 1886.

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON

BY

C. VILLIERS STANFORD.

	s.	d.

THE TIMES.

If "The Revenge" does not become widely popular among choral societies it will be to the loss of those societies.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

A work for which there is a widespread popularity in store.

DAILY NEWS.

In a word, Mr. Stanford has written a vivid, powerful, patriotic, and masterly work of its class, which has commenced what must prove a long career of popularity.

THE GLOBE.

The work is full of beauties from beginning to end, and will greatly enhance the reputation of the composer, who directed this performance, and at its conclusion was twice called for, and greeted with enthusiastic and fully merited cheers.

ATHENÆUM.

That the work will be immensely popular with choral societies and the public there cannot be a shadow of a doubt.

YORKSHIRE POST.

We think it may safely be predicted that this choral ballad will become a favourite study with provincial musical societies.

HARK! THE HERALD ANGELS SING

(WITH ILLUSTRATED TITLE)

Being an Introduction and eleven Variations for the Organ upon Mendelssohn's well-known Christmas Hymn Tune. In this piece the Variations are not dependent upon each other; therefore, where the whole piece is not required, a selection of the easiest Variations can be made, and in place of the last Variation the Hymn might be sung.

THE SHIPWRECK

BIRMINGHAM PRIZE GLEE

ALFRED R. GAUL.

MORNING.

'Tis morn, and the gallant bark bounds free,
In the joyous gale o'er a sunlit sea;
And the waves, as they merrily waltz along,
Welcome her onward with dance and song,
But a black cloud looms from the western sky,
And tells as it scuds of a tempest nigh,
And the sea-eagle screams as he flaps in the shrouds,
Like a warning voice from the bursting clouds.

THE STORM.

It comes! the storm! the shrieking, shattering storm,
With the thunder's crash and the lightning's flash,
'Mid the yawning skies and the wild waves' dash!
See yonder, that form—'tis the fiend of the storm!
How he whirls the good ship in the might of his wrath,
To the gulf where the foam surges white in his path!
And a wild cry rings thro' the tempest shill,
As she sinks in the billows, and all is still.

EVENING.

'Tis eve on the waters—an ocean of light
Bares its breast to the moon, rising gentle and bright;
And the stars, as they beam on the silvery main,
On the calm of its depths are all mirror'd again.
Ah, list! o'er the deep doth a melody sweep,
Now the storm fiend hath flown, and the waves are asleep;
Ah, list! o'er the grave of the true and the brave!
'Tis the mermaid singing her dirge on the wave.

Price Fourpence.

The gratuitous loan of Band Parts can be had from the Composer, as also an arrangement of the Orchestral Parts as Pianoforte Duet, for use when a Band is not available.

J. CURWEN & SONS

Are frequently asked to purchase Tonic Sol-fa rights in works that have already been issued in the old notation. This they invariably decline to do, as they deal only with entire copyrights, and issue all their music in both OLD and NEW NOTATIONS. It will save disappointment to Composers and Publishers if this is borne in mind. 8, Warwick Lane, E.C., November, 1886.

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

WITH A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF ENGLISH WRITINGS ON MUSIC

By JAMES D. BROWN.

"Taken as a whole, Mr. Brown's dictionary must be pronounced an important addition to existing musical literature."—Athenaeum.

"Within about 700 pages, Mr. Brown has given all the details necessary of the works of nearly every musician whose name need be mentioned. The dictionary is particularly rich in particulars of British works, about which Sir George Grove is too often either incorrect or altogether silent."—The London Figaro.

"A monument of persevering labour and exhaustive research."—Scotsman.

"On the whole, the book is a most creditable example of patient and painstaking labour. It has, moreover, a distinct value, and in right of its succinctness, trustworthiness, and handiness, will have a place in every musical library."—Musical Times.

"The book contains an immense number of names not to be found in any other dictionary."—Academy.

"Mr. Brown's volume is decidedly the most perfect English work on Musical Biography now existing, both in regard to the accuracy and the fulness of its information."—Scottish Review.

RUTH

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"Ruth" is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musically—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"Ruth" has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so thoroughly popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wales Express.

"Full of flowing melody."—Salisbury Times.

THE HOLY CITY

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"To show the great popularity of Mr. Gaul's Cantata, 'The Holy City,' it may be mentioned that the rendering at Saltley Mission Hall, on Friday last, was the fortieth in Birmingham and its immediate environs since its production."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

"The work is an honour to English art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The Holy City" is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; ditto, paper boards, 3s.; ditto, scarlet cloth, 4s.; Voice parts, for the use of Choral Societies, each 1s. A Selection of Soprano and Contralto Movements for School Use, 7s. 3d. Band Parts on Loan. Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s.

THE MONTHS

Words by EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL

(Composer of the "Holy City," "Ruth," &c.)

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, 'April,' and No. 5, 'May,' are our special favourites, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where sisters or friends delight in joining voices. The pianoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary pianist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.
